Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is a mysterious feature about the "turnover," which I confess the Senator from Massachusetts understands better than I do, and he may be correct; but I want it understood that these corporations which deal in nothing but food supplies, which have nothing to do with anything except that, which is an indispensable part of feeding the people of Europe and of this country, have realized under the administration of Mr. Hoover vaster profits than they have ever realized before in the history of their concerns. I will incorporate some figures later which will satisfy the Senator of the scandalous extortions of these companies from the people of this country. I do not want any man to operate a trust fund by my vote who thinks that those figures represent decency or honesty.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I call the Senator's attention to the testimony now being taken before the Agricultural Committee on this question, in which Mr. Heney stated that Mr. Cotton, the eminent Wall Street lawyer, who had charge of the meat end of the packing bureau of Mr. Hoover, stated to him that the profits of the packers for 1917 had been nothing less than a scandal.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, was not that before Mr. Hoover took charge?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. Hoover took charge, as I understand, in August of 1917. It was not limited to the time before that. He said for the year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Was not the inference very clearly drawn that the profits were decreased after Mr. Hoover took charge?

Mr. KENYON. I think not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think that will be borne out by an examination of the record.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have here, and will ask to insert in the RECORD without reading, a portion of the reports of these concerns, taken from their own records, which seem to me a sufficient basis upon which men may reasonably argue as to what they received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the profits to which Mr. Heney referred have reference to a period prior to the actual entry of this country into the war, these reports show, and the statements are made, that those profits, instead of being decreased, have been augmented and enlarged. So, Mr. President, we need not stop here now to discuss the details of this matter as to the shades of profits, or as to when or how the profits are made. The sum total of the fact is that they have been realized during this time in a way that they have never been realized before.

A distinguished member of the Peace Commission, Mr. White, cabled to this country that we had on hand a large store of undistributed foods of different kinds, and that this would enable us to work off the supply at a stabilizing price. I wonder if Mr. White was familiar with the fact that the food supply to which he refers as being on hand and undistributed in this country is now in urgent demand by not thousands but by hundreds of thousands of people in our own country? It is not available, Mr. President, to introduce that kind of an argument in order to move the Congress, because the Congress knows that if any such supplies are on hand there is a ready demand for them in the United States.

But that is not a matter which is controlling with me. I know that $100,000,000 is just the beginning if we are going to stabilize Europe from the standpoint of feeding the people. The press dispatches already carry the information that not less than $350,000,000 or $400,000,000 will be necessary to make a reasonable start. Assuming that England and France do their portion, the three hundred and fifty million or four hundred million, we are already advised, is the beginning. Therefore I ask that the President put the distribution of this fund in the hands of those who have not only the ability but the viewpoint which will compel those who sell the food to share the sacrifice with those who pay the taxes.

Whatever may be the great ability of Mr. Hoover, there is one individual whom he does not know exists in this country, and that is the taxpayer. He seems to think that money comes like manna to the children of Israel from Heaven and not from the sweat and toil and sacrifice of the people. He has no conception of the existence of the taxpayer, and his distribution of foods is utterly regardless of his existence.

For these reasons, Mr. President, under the present circumstances, with no information, no restrictions, no safeguards, no directions, no limitations, we are turning over a hundred million dollars to be distributed and I can not indorse it. In the name of common honesty, of common fairness with those whom we represent, in the name of those who are now positively discouraged by reason of the taxes imposed upon them, to wit, the business men of this country, in the name of the poor, the prices of whose food will be raised by this bill, let us throw around the undertaking the ordinary safeguards of a sane transaction.

Mr. President, I have not argued the constitutional power. I do not think we have the power to appropriate money for any such use. But I have been here too long to hope to succeed in interposing a mere constitutional inhibition against a chance to appropriate $100,000,000. The odds against the Constitution are too great.

[Article from Christian Science Monitor.]

CHICAGO, ILL.

The earning power of the smallest of the American meat packers in the present period appears a subject of interest, for one thing because the greatest food distributors in the world to-day are, naturally, more than ever before in the public eye; and then, again, because this packer, the Cudahy Packing Co., is the first of the "big five" to report on the first year under Government profit regulation. By earning power is taken to mean the total earnings of the company, that figure which the Food Administration regulation was set to limit, that amount on which the Federal war tax will be levied. By earning power, in short, is meant, in this connection, the total profit the company made in its dealings with the public.

This earning power of the smallest of the packers was shown in a previous article on the Cudahy annual report in these columns (Dec. 20, 1918) to be larger for 1918 than ever before. Sales of the company also were much larger than in the previous history of the Cudahy Co.

Now, it may be of interest to measure this earning power of the smallest packer against the capital stock, to show what this earning power is equivalent to in terms of the common stock.

The total Cudahy profits, as represented in the term "earning power" as here used, may be assumed to have been $6,000,000 in 1918. The company's net profit of $3,376,808.58, plus its big reserve of $2,785,412.78, set aside for "Federal income and war-profits taxes and contingencies," amounts to more than $6,000,000, but that round figure may well be taken as representative of the year's total profits or the company's earning power. The capitalization is $20,000,000, divided into $2,000,000 of 6 per cent preferred, $6,550,500 of 7 per cent preferred, and $11,449,500 of common stock. After paying the regular dividends on the preferred stock the $6,000,000 profit would represent an earning power of 47.4 per cent on the common stock.

Now, there were two stock dividends declared by the Cudahy Co. in the last three years prior to the end of the 1918 year. The first of these was in November of 1915, amounting to $2,000,000. The second came a year later, amounting to $2,724,750. Together they amounted to $4,724,750. If these two stock dividends be subtracted from the total of the capital stock, which, of course, they helped to bring to its present figure, this leaves a balance of common stock of $6,724,750. If the 1918 earning power of the company, namely, at the rate of $6,000,000, were to be computed on the common stock remaining after that portion representative of stock dividends were deducted, it would be equivalent to an earning power of 80 per cent.

Should it be remarked that it is unusual to compute earning power in the sense used against the common stock, because the common stock does not share in such earning power, but only in what remains after Federal taxes are paid, which makes a large deduction from gross earnings, it may be said that this is perfectly true as far as the stockholders are concerned, but the public may nevertheless be interested in such a comparison. Up to the last few years there were no large Federal taxes to make such deductions, and it is possible that within a few years more Federal taxes may be much smaller, in which case that much more of the total profits will go to the stockholders. The public, so students of the packing industry here pointed out, is naturally interested in the total profits packers make and what they may represent as measures against the ownership of the company, because the public makes those profits possible; because, one of these students has put it, "the consuming power of the public is the vital breath of this and every other great corporation."

As to what stockholders do get, after the big tax reserve has been subtracted from profits, leaving net profits of $3,376,808.58 to be computed against the capital stock, the rate of earning on the common stock is 24.44 per cent.

Then, again, as to the deduction of the amount of stock dividends from the total of common stock and the calculation of rate of return on the remainder, stock dividends have been a favorite device of big corporations to make their profit look small, and a word in general about the usual packer stock dividends will perhaps not be amiss.

A stock dividend represents capitalized profits. It represents money made by the company, over and above cash dividends paid, which remains in the business in the form of surplus, and of which stockholders are given ownership through the issue of so much new stock free to them. This new stock, of course, increases the company capitalization by that much. Since a concern's rate of earning is based on the company's capitalization, particularly on its common stock, given a fixed amount of profits, the rate of earning will appear high or low, according as the amount of the common stock is small or great. For instance, Morris & Co., another of the packers, still retains a capitalization of $3,000,000, though the business is worth many millions more than that and the company is considerably larger than the Cudahy company. If Morris & Co. made no more profit than Cudahy did in 1918, still it would show more than 100 per cent profit on its capital stock, though the smaller Cudahy company, with a larger capital stock, evidences a very much smaller rate of earning. Hence a stock dividend, by enlarging the amount of the divisor in the fraction, to wit, the capitalization, may have a decided influence on the aspect of profits.

If the two stock dividends of the Cudahy Co. previously referred to be deducted from the common stock, and the rate of return to stockholders be calculated on the basis of the 1918 "net profits"—that is to say, $3,376,808.58, the amount available for dividends and surplus after provision was made for war taxes, etc.—it is noted to be 41 per cent. The rate of return on the common, without the stock dividend deduction, has already been observed as 24.44 per cent.

Not every stock dividend may be subject to criticism, as, for instance, where a concern has been making reasonable profits and turning back a portion of them into the business, eventually to set up this portion of past reasonable profits into common stock. In the case of several of the meat-packer stock dividends and of the Standard Oil stock dividends, there has been a suspicion on the part of the public that the profit there reposing represented, in the aggregate, an undue amount.

The Cudahy Co. in 1918 showed the largest earning power, as heretofore defined, in its history. Its net profits were larger than in any previous year with the exception of 1917. The company has had some hard sledding in several past years. The Cudahy profit figures are of interest, now and for the future, in the view of local students of the industry, in regard to the Cudahy Co., and more particularly in regard to the earnings of the leaders of the "big five," whose sales and profits run much higher, indeed, than those of the last of the quintet.

TESTIMONY GIVEN BY FRANCIS J. HENEY BEFORE THE COMMITTEE, AN ATTORNEY SELECTED BY THE PRESIDENT TO MAKE AN EXAMINATION OF THE BUSINESS AFFAIRS OF THE PACKERS.

Mr. HENEY. I can summarize it by saying that the evidence gathered by the Federal Trade Commission convinced me that five large packers—Armour & Co., Swift & Co., Morris & Co., Wilson & Co. (Inc.), and Cudahy & Co.—have what is, in effect, a monopoly of the meat business of the United States, and have it so intrenched by similar control over other meat-producing countries that are tributary to the United States—I refer particularly to South America—that they are able to absolutely overturn the natural law of supply and demand in fixing the prices to the producers as well as in fixing the prices to the consumers.

Senator GRONNA. I want to be pardoned for interrupting you, but we had hearings last year and the question of stock came up. The Federal Government, as you know, had taken control of the packing interests, and Mr. Cotton, of New York, a very able lawyer, was for us and he was asked the question how he arranged the profits for these concerns, and he made the broad statement that he based their earnings upon the money borrowed; and I think it is very significant that we should understand all these things, because the consumers will know why meat is high.

Mr. HENEY. Senator, the regulation of the packers by Mr. Cotton is a joke. They made more money under the regulations than they made in 1917, and Mr. Cotton told me himself on two occasions that their profits in 1917 could only be described by the word "scandalous."

Senator GRONNA. I am very glad to hear you say that, Mr. Heney, because that was my belief, and I practically said it last winter.

Mr. HENEY. I proceeded in the beginning——

Senator KENYON. How did he happen to be appointed?

Mr. HENEY. I do not know, Senator, but he was selected by Mr. Hoover.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I believe the pending bill has been so amended as to exclude from participation in the benefits of this proposed appropriation all of the people of Germany, German-Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, and so as to make it specific that Armenia, the Czecho-Slavs, the Jugo-Slavs, and certain other peoples, may participate in the benefits thereof.

I am glad the bill has been so amended. Before it was amended I was bitterly and unspeakably opposed to its passage. Having been so amended, I do not regard it as so objectionable as it would be otherwise, but still I can not see my way clear to vote for it, and I shall vote against it, and I will give what I trust may be a brief statement of my reasons for so doing.

Before the bill was amended undoubtedly it was so worded that the money proposed to be appropriated might be spent for the benefit of the people of any nation on earth except the people of Germany. As the bill was originally worded the money, if appropriated, might be expended for the benefit of murderous Turks, Bulgarians, and Austrians—people who are murderers, thieves, rapists, cutthroats, fiends, and who waged a wicked, criminal, infamous warfare against civilization. There was nothing that I could find in the printed report of the hearings on the bill which would show either how the money was to be expended or to whom it was to go. Of course, it has been wisely restricted by the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and which has been adopted; but still I know of no constitutional authority for making this appropriation—for taxing the people of this country to raise money and giving it as a gift to the people of foreign countries—and I speak of this as a proposed gift, because I firmly believe at least nine-tenths of it will be a gift—an act of charity. I do not believe we will ever get the one-tenth part of it back. I think it is recognized that by far the greater part of it is intended to be a gift, and I know of no constitutional authority for taking hard-earned tax money, wrung from the struggling people of this country, and giving it away with a lavish hand to the people of foreign countries.

I subscribe very heartily to the doctrine enunciated on this floor last year by the very able and distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who is deservedly recognized as high constitutional authority, when he said that, the Constitution having given Congress the power to declare war, Congress undoubtedly had the implied power to do anything necessary to win the war; that it would be an idle thing to give Congress the power to declare war without giving it also all power necessary to win that war. That is my belief, and I have acted on that theory during the entire period of our participation in the European war. I have had that theory in mind and supported it in every vote I have cast in voting on measures for the prosecution of the European war.

But the President has told us that the war has ended. On the 11th day of November the President appeared before Congress and said "the war thus comes to an end," and we know that so far as hostilities are concerned war is at an end; so I do not feel this can be considered as a war measure. I do not consider it a war measure. I do not believe there is a Senator in this presence who considers it a war measure.

We were never at war with Turkey. We were never at war with Bulgaria. We only declared war upon Germany and Austria. Theoretically, that war is in existence, because permanent peace has not been declared, but is there a Senator here who will arise now and say that the appropriation of this money is necessary for the winning of the war against Austria? Is there a Senator here who will arise and say that the enactment of this measure is necessary for the winning of the war against Germany? Is there a Senator here who will arise and say that unless we enact this measure there is danger that Austria will win this war against the United States? Is there a Senator here who will arise and say that unless we appropriate this money there is danger that Germany will defeat us in this war? No; there is not one who will do so. Then, if those are not facts, this is not a necessary war measure.

I can not find it in me; I can not find it in my conscience, my convictions, or my judgment to vote $100,000,000 of the money of the people of this country for the benefit of the people of foreign countries, when there is no apparent constitutional warrant for it, while the cost of comfortable living in this country is far beyond the reach of thousands of our own people, and when every hundred million dollars' worth of food that is taken out of this country and sent to the peoples of foreign countries, we all know, enhances the cost of living and makes the price of food rise still further in this country and puts the necessities of life still further beyond the reach of some of our own people.

A few days ago I read an article in a newspaper which stated that a poor woman in New York City, the mother of two children, found the price of milk was beyond her means and that she was unable to buy milk for her children. The poor woman, discouraged and disheartened, in the agony of her soul at the thought of her children suffering for the want of milk hurled herself out of a second-story window to the pavement beneath and killed herself. That is only an instance. It is only one instance of dire poverty and distress of thousands that exist in this country due to the high cost of living.

There will soon be great unemployment in this country, I believe. I am informed that in Butte, Mont., there are now 8,000 unemployed men and they know not where to go to obtain employment. There are thousands upon thousands of unemployed in other sections of the country and the list of unemployed is mounting higher every day. I believe we owe something to our own people. I believe we should consider our own to some extent. If the time comes in the near future when there are many thousands of people in this country out of employment and out of means, what are we going to do? Shall we turn loose the Federal Treasury for their benefit and make appropriations out of the Federal Treasury to support everybody who can not make a living in this country and in all the world? If we are going to stretch the Constitution at all, I believe in doing it in behalf of our own people first. Attend to our own first, and when there is no suffering here, when everybody's wants here have been supplied, then let us see to supplying the wants of needy peoples in Europe.

I suppose this bill will pass, but if so, it will set a precedent which will be bad. I believe it will rise to plague us in the future. I believe this is only the beginning, and the end is not anywhere in sight. I believe it will only be a short time until we will be called upon to appropriate another hundred million dollars for people in Europe. I believe in the near future we will be called upon to appropriate money for people in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey—our enemies—in our undertaking to save the civilization of the world.

If I were to vote for this bill, I would consider that I was violating my oath of office and my duty to the people of America, and I can not conscientiously do it. I have very clear, conscientious objections against it.

There are other reasons why I can not see my way clear to vote for the bill. In the cablegrams which have been laid before the Senate committee and before the Senate in support of the appropriation provided for in the bill it is stated with emphasis that one of the objects of the bill, I may say the principal object, is to stem the tide of bolshevism in Europe; to keep the people of Austria, Bulgaria, Turkey, and Poland from becoming Bolshevists. Are we to hire people, with criminality in their hearts, to abstain from criminal acts? Are we to hire people to abstain from assaults upon organized society? Are we to hire people to abstain from assaulting civilization? Are we to hire people to be law-abiding? Are we to hire people not to be criminals? Are we with food to buy people to be good and not to commit crime? Are we to take the taxpayers' money and use it in buying the peace of the world? Is peace so dear that we must buy it? If so, the world has come to a sorry plight. The idea is repugnant to me and to my sense of right and fairness. I do not believe in yielding to the clamor of people that unless we feed them they will commit depredations, upset law and order. If we do it this year, we may have it to do next year.

If we are to do that, then we have thousands and thousands of I. W. W.'s, Bolshevists, and other anarchists in this country whom we might as well begin to hire to be good. We do not have to go away from home to do it. We might as well turn loose Debs and Mooney, Alexander Berkman and Emma Goldman. We might as well liberate the 100 I. W. W.'s who were convicted at Chicago a few weeks ago and put in the penitentiary. We might as well turn loose and free the 46 I. W. W.'s who were convicted a few days ago in a Federal court in California and sentenced to the penitentiary. We might as well say to all of them, "You do not need to go to the penitentiary; we will hire you to be good; we will keep you in idleness; we will give you food; we will give you everything you want."

That may be one way to stop I. W. W.ism. It may be one way to stop bolshevism. It may be one way to stop anarchy. But is it the proper and right way? Is it right to do it? Is it just to do it? Would it be justice to law-abiding, upright people, who stand for organized society and civilization, to tax them and take their money away from them by force and give it to the criminal minded to keep the latter from acts of criminal violence against organized society?

If we are going to embark on this then we might as well appropriate $100,000,000 to give to Lenine and Trotzky in Russia. I suppose we could for a short time stop bolshevism in Russia by giving them millions of dollars, by taking a shovel and scooping out to them millions of dollars of our taxpayers' money and saying, "We will support you in idleness; we will give you food." Suppose we could stop bolshevism in Russia that way. Would it be just and right to do it? Would it be just to the people who maintain organized society, who uphold civilization, who stand for law and order, and who pay the taxes, to take their money away from them by force and give it to the criminally minded who wave aloft the torch of incendiarism and hold a bowie knife at the throat of civilization?

I do not like the grounds upon which the proposed appropriation is asked. I decline to have the highwayman's dagger put at my heart to make me give up. I decline to have the murderer's bowie knife put at my throat to make me vote other people's money in order to keep them from indulging in criminal assaults upon the civilization of Europe. It is a wrong principle in my opinion. It is not founded on justice and right. I earnestly and sincerely protest against it.

In opposing this bill from a sense of duty I do so with all respect to the President of the United States. I know the President has asked for this appropriation, but I do not believe the Congress has been given sufficient specific, definite information to justify the Congress in making the appropriation. It is, at least, not sufficiently enlightening to me. I feel we should be very careful in such matters.

In all that I say I speak with the highest respect for the President of the United States, for whom I have warm regard, and in whose motives and good intentions I have every confidence. I know his high-minded ideals and the generous impulses of his heart. I know his intentions are good and in this matter I differ from him, with my present light, with the greatest respect. However, in this matter I have firm convictions of my own.

In the prosecution of this war it has been my fortune and honor to stand without exception, invariably and unwaveringly, behind the President of the United States in support of his measures. Not one thing for which he has ever asked in the prosecution of the war have I declined to vote for. With almost no exception of great consequence, it has been my pleasure to support all the policies of the President of the United States in time of peace, as well as war, up to this time. In peace and war almost invariably it has been my good fortune to view the issues which were presented to us as he viewed them. However, the President tells us the war has ended, and we all know it has practically ended. It is finally ended unless it should be renewed, and at this time I see no prospect of that. I know of none of our foes who have the power or the resources to renew the war and wage it afresh.

I have some very fixed, firm, and settled convictions about the policy to be pursued by us toward the people of the nations that waged a wicked, infamous, criminal warfare against civilization. I have some fixed, firm, and settled convictions about the policy to be pursued toward European peoples, now that peace has come. I have some fixed, firm, and settled convictions about my duty toward the American people, now that peace has come to the people of this country.

I know that we spent money with reckless prodigality during the prosecution of the war. Millions of dollars of money were doubtless spent in lavish, even extravagant, ways where they could have been expended more economically had there been no need for haste, but I had no serious objection to that. With me, it was anything to win the war. Winning the war was the paramount object with me in the dark days during which civilization trembled in the balance. The liberty of the world was at stake. With me, winning the war was above economy and above every other consideration. Now, however, that the days of actual, if not theoretical, peace have returned, I believe we ought to be rigidly careful about the expenditure of the people's money. I believe we ought to be seriously careful and thoughtful about the constitutionality of our appropriations. I believe we ought to be careful to remain within the bounds of prudence and constitutional safety, and that we ought to think first of the American people above all other peoples of the earth. I do not say that if it were properly, specifically, and definitely shown to the Congress that people of foreign lands who befriended us in this war, who stood steadfastly by our side in waging warfare for the preservation of civilization, who were our allies and our friends, were suffering for the necessities of life, starving, dying, I would not under any circumstances vote to appropriate money for them. But I am not willing to do it when confronted with the threat of a highwayman that "unless you feed us we will turn Bolsheviki and set the world afire." I will not do it under compulsion of any highwayman's threat. I will not do it to prevent bolshevism in Europe or in this country or in any other country on the face of the earth. I will not do it to hire people to desist from crime. When I do so it will be because I am convinced of the necessity, constitutionality, justice, and humanity thereof; not to keep people who have criminal instincts restrained from venting them.

Against this threat that unless the people of Europe are fed they will turn Bolshevists and make assaults upon the civilization of the world I simply stand by my ideals of right and civilization. I take my stand upon the side of law and order, and if right and civilization must go down before the assaults of criminals, anarchists, Bolshevists, I say let us go down standing for the right, standing by our colors, and with colors flying.

If the time ever comes in this country when there is room for only two political parties—one that stands for organized society and one that stands for anarchy—I shall take my stand with the one that stands for organized society and stay with it. I do not believe in compromise with crime. I will not yield to threats of people who have criminality in their hearts, who say that unless they have their way they will turn Bolshevists.

For these reasons I can not see my way clear to vote for this appropriation. I make this statement in order to make clear my views on the matter. I am a long way yet from being convinced of the necessity for and justification of this proposed appropriation. I think it is merely a beginning, that we will be called upon for other hundreds of millions of dollars, and that we should know more about what kind of a beginning we are making before we make the beginning, and should know more about where the end is to be. I must have more impelling and what I consider better reasons for the proposed appropriation before I can conscientiously give it my sanction.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR HUGHES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I give the following notice, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That on Sunday, January 26 next, following the exercises in memory of the life, character, and public service of the late Senator BROUSSARD, the Senate will consider resolutions upon the life, character, and public service of WILLIAM HUGHES, late a Senator from the State of New Jersey.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be entered.

RECESS.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, notice has been given for memorial exercises in honor of the late Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, and the late Senator BRADY, of Idaho, on to-morrow at 11 o'clock. I move that the Senate take a recess until that hour.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Sunday, January 19, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 18, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for this moment in the day's proceedings; since the human heart is like that of a musical instrument, touched by a master hand it brings forth sweet melodies, rich, deep harmonies.

Touch our hearts, we beseech Thee, with the Holy Spirit, that they may respond in deep, full harmony to life and its far-reaching purposes, unperturbed by the discordant sounds around us; that we may fulfill our appointed mission, to the honor and glory of Thy Holy Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, had requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SHEPPARD, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE LATE THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 16, 1919.

The Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose for the information of the House of Representatives a translation of a telegram addressed by the president of the House of Representatives of Cuba to the President of the House of Representatives of the United States, quoting a resolution adopted by the Cuban House of Representatives expressing its sympathy in view of the death of the late Theodore Roosevelt, former President of the United States. A copy of the telegram has been communicated to this department by the Cuban minister at this Capital.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

FRANK L. POLK,
Acting Secretary of State.

[Translation.]

HABANA.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington:

The House of Representatives, assembled in solemn and extraordinary session, has to-day unanimously agreed to enter in its journal the profound sorrow of the Cuban people on account of the death of Theodore Roosevelt, the best friend of Cuban independence and one of the greatest figures of modern times.

The house also voted to express to you that it shares with your illustrious body this immense misfortune, and in order to associate itself with the feeling of sadness of the noble American people it expresses the wish that the memory of the illustrious Roosevelt may serve to cement more, if possible, the fraternal bonds which have united in glorious days the two peoples.

MIGUEL COYULA, President.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes, in order that I may have a telegram read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in the edition of the Washington Post of yesterday, January 17, 1919, we see the headline "Bread line by May 1." Then follows a report of a statement made by Mr. Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, in which he names various cities in the United States where there is a large list of unemployed men. Youngstown, Ohio, my home city, was one of those in which he said there were 5,000 unemployed men. I desire to have the following telegram read which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the telegram in the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

There was no objection.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, January 17, 1919.

Hon. JOHN G. COOPER: Five thousand unemployed men would represent practically 10 per cent of working population, and such a condition positively does not exist in Youngstown, Ohio. Absolutely no foundation for statement of Morrison regarding this community. Fact of the matter is there was a temporary lay off by a local industry of about 2,500 men for a few days so as to readjust an operating division during transition from war to peace basis. All industries working practically on normal basis. Discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines being absorbed by industries and commercial organizations as fast as they return, according to applications. Urgently recommend this denial be referred to House Committee on Immigration.

FRED A. LABELLE,
Secretary Youngstown Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am requested by the Youngstown Chamber of Commerce to present these facts to the House, as they believe the statement of Mr. Morrison has attracted a great deal of uncomplimentary comment regarding the industrial conditions at present in the city of Youngstown, Ohio.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14078, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. ALEXANDER in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be construed to apply to any purchase or service rendered for the Department of Commerce when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $25.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. This bill carries something like $100,000,000. While it seems to be the tendency of legislative bodies to look after the interests of the tax spender more than the taxpayer, I desire to congratulate the chairman of this committee, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and the ranking Republican on the committee, Mr. STAFFORD, both of whom are very amiable and agreeable and hard-working gentlemen, for the efforts they have made, and the efforts the entire committee have made, in holding down the appropriations in this bill.

The lack of food caused the bolshevism in Europe, but can not cause it in America, as we have the food.

Two things, however, may cause bolshevism here.

First. The high cost of living, which is caused partly by profiteering.

Second. Lack of employment.

Congress and the entire Government must devote its utmost energies to prevent this.

Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, states that we will have bread lines in this country by May 1.

I think and hope he is wrong, but he may be right.

In time of opportunities we should prepare against bolshevism.

I will read the statement of Mr. Morrison:

BREAD LINES BY MAY 1—FRANK MORRISON GIVES LABOR SURVEY TO HOUSE COMMITTEE—OPPOSES MORE IMMIGRATION—WANTS IT PROHIBITED FOUR YEARS—LIST OF CITIES WHERE LARGE NUMBERS ARE UNEMPLOYED IS GIVEN—HOPES BUILDING WILL PICK UP IN THE SPRING AND TAKE SOME MEN.

"When the men in the Army are demobilized," said Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, yesterday before the House Immigration Committee, "we are going to have bread lines in every industrial center by May 1. After that date it is hoped that building will pick up and take some of the men."

Surveys of industrial conditions in many cities showing unemployment were presented by Mr. Morrison in urging legislation prohibiting immigration for four years. Labor leaders, he said, made the survey Tuesday at his request.

The estimated number of unemployed given by the survey included:

LIST OF THE CITIES.

Los Angeles, 8,000; New Britain, Conn., 2,000; Chicago, 75,000; Louisville, Ky., 2,900; New Orleans, 20,000; Boston, 20,000; Grand Rapids, 5,000; St. Paul, 8,000; St. Louis, 15,000; Kansas City, 2,000; Trenton, 2,500; New York City, 20,000; Cincinnati, 5,000; Cleveland, 40,000; Portland, Oreg., 9,000; Toledo, 17,000; Youngstown, 5,000; Aberdeen, Wash., 3,000; Milwaukee, 7,000.

Charleston, S. C., and Wilmington, Del., reported no unemployment; Jersey City said there was "no notable distress because of unemployment"; Newark, N. J., reports "five men for every job"; Duluth, Minn., reported a fair demand, and Jacksonville, Fla., that supply and demand were equal.

Millions of men were unemployed before the war, Mr. Morrison said, and the demand did not equal the supply until 3,000,000 had been called into the Army. Steel companies and packers, he declared, caused the oversupply by importing men to get cheap labor.

We must practice economy in all public expenditures, for I find that all legislative bodies pay too much attention to the tax spender and too little to the taxpayer.

The taxpayer seems to have no friend at court.

No one seems to consider that the taxpayer finally has to pay for all these bonds and taxes.

The idea seems to be spend, spend, spend, and let the taxpayer foot the bill.

The time has come when we must consider the rights of the taxpayer. It seems to be a standing joke that it costs the Government more to do anything than it would cost private parties.

There should be developed in this country a tendency toward economy, not toward extravagance; toward efficiency, not toward inefficiency; toward care and caution in the expenditure of public money, not toward shiftlessness.

The greatest question now confronting this country is reconstruction, and the most important feature of that reconstruction is the readjustment of industry, the discharge of soldiers in the Army, the employment of labor, the control of the food supply and the control of food prices, the handling of the transportation situation, so that we may prevent disorganization and depression.

We must demobilize the Army in such a way that we will assist industry as much as possible and disturb it as little as possible.

We must build up American trade abroad, extend American commerce, and, above all, not interfere with American industries that desire to extend their trade abroad.

We must devote more time to this country and conditions here and less to countries abroad. We must teach and practice Americanism. American ideas must always prevail here. We should as much as possible use American goods, and "Made in America" should be on everything we use.

It is estimated that before the United States entered this war there were not more than 300,000 bondholders in the country. The four liberty loan campaigns added nearly 30,000,000 more to that list; or, in other words, just so many more people in the United States have been taught the habit of saving.

We must protect these bondholders. We took 100 cents on the dollar from these bondholders for the bonds they purchased, but if they wanted to sell most of these issues they would have to sell them at less than par.

The last loan is now selling at about 95 cents on a dollar, and there should be some legislation of some kind that would bring these bonds to par, especially as we expect more liberty loans to be made and floated.

I will insert for the benefit of the House a statement concerning the price of liberty bonds:

LIBERTY BONDS.

[Quoted by Otis & Co.]

There are seven classes of liberty bonds on the stock exchange. When a higher rate liberty bond is issued in exchange for a lower, the bond issued in exchange has the same maturity and interest dates as the bond turned in.

In the table below first 4s are 4s which have been issued in exchange for 3½s. First 4¼s are 4¼s issued in exchange for 3½s or for first 4s. Second 4s are the original bonds of the second loan. Second 4¼s are 4¼s issued in exchange for second loan 4s. Third 4¼s are the third loan original bonds. Fourth 4¼ bonds are the fourth loan original bonds.

Accrued interest to time of sale or purchase in addition to these prices.

We should establish a merchant marine in some form in order that the ships we have built may be utilized to help build up American trade abroad.

We must give pensions to the soldiers who have fought the battles of the Republic in this war with Germany and take care of their widows, orphans, and dependents.

The soldiers who have been injured in battle or in the line of duty must be treated honorably and justly by this Government.

We must see to it that preference is given our soldiers in the matter of employment, especially as against those alien slackers who refused to do their bit toward the preservation of democracy and humanity. I would go as far as to make it a crime for any person, firm, or corporation to give preference of employment to an alien slacker as against a patriotic son of America.

Likewise, all aliens who served this country should be made citizens immediately upon being honorably discharged from the Army or Navy.

We finally will find that there can be no great success here industrially or internationally without a strong, healthy, and well-developed national life.

We do not compare our workmen with those of any other country. They are better paid, better fed, better clothed, better housed, better educated, and demand more for their families than the workmen of any other country in the world, and they do not ask these things as a matter of charity but they do ask the right to work and earn them.

Simply feeding an American workman does not satisfy him; he demands something more.

One of the most important things this Congress should do is to punish profiteering, which is the main cause of high prices in the matter of foodstuffs.

There may have been some small justification for high food prices during the war, but there is none now.

We produce more foodstuffs than we consume, and they should cost less because of that fact.

I will insert as a part of my remarks tables furnished by the Bureau of Markets, Department of Agriculture, which show that there is much more meat in cold storage than there was a year ago.

This is also true of other food products.

Congress can prevent this hoarding of food products in the cold-storage warehouses by legislation.

I introduced at the last session of Congress a bill fixing the price of cotton, and it caused a panic in the southern cotton market, because there was no justification of the high price of cotton at that time.

If Congress would show a disposition to regulate these cold-storage plants, the price of meat would drop instantly.

With the large number of people now out of employment, which will be augmented as spring approaches, there will have to be a great reduction in the prices of food products or many people in this country will be up against starvation.

Hunger and starvation have been the cause of the Bolshevism in Europe. Let us see to it that they do not cause it here.

We have set an example for the world in the matter of free government. We have set an example for the world in the matter of civilization. We have set an example for the world in the matter of charity. Let us now set an example for the world along the lines of industrial achievements.

I will now read from the Ohio Republican:

THE H. C. OF L.

The National Industrial Conference has reported that the cost of living between July, 1914, and November, 1918, has gone up from 65 to 70 per cent. The increase in the cost of food has been placed at 83 per cent; shelter, 20 per cent; clothing, 93 per cent; fuel and light, 55 per cent; sundries, 55 per cent.

For example, increases in the cost of woolen yarn goods ranged from 96.4 per cent for poplin to 131.5 per cent for serge. Then cotton ranged from 87.9 per cent for voile to 264.4 per cent for percale.

Men's and women's coats selling for $10 in 1914 cost from $19 to $20 in November, 1918, and suits retailing at $15 in 1914 showed an increase of about 75 per cent. Hosiery went up 90 to 95 per cent. Men's shoes at $3.50 in 1914 were frequently selling for $6 in 1918. Women's $3 shoes brought $5.75. Children's shoes doubtless advanced in similar proportion, although the report does not specify.

Such abnormal increases in cost must of necessity work hardships on all families save those which have shared largely in the prosperities of the war. It must be kept in mind that unless this war is different from all others, the period of inflated prosperity will be in time succeeded by a period of reaction and depression, which may or not reach panic conditions. Such periods will again affect the average family, and thus we find it being whipsawed by the high prices of a war prosperity in which it may or may not have shared, or by the hard-times reaction in which it seldom avoids sharing.

The happiness and welfare of the American family is one of the basic objects of our Government. Unfortunately the average home is commonplace. It lacks all the glamour of great issues. It lacks all the enchantment which comes from distance. Its simple necessities secure no councils of the great, no royal banquets, no regal processions.

Yet it is apparent that the conditions of living in the United States call for the gravest, wisest, and most immediate consideration by the Government. The happiness and even the welfare of a nation may depend upon such prosaic things as the price of a beefsteak, the cost of a pair of children's shoes, the amount asked for a ton of coal. For a people to be happy they must be well nourished, reasonably clad, sheltered from the elements. * * *

The present Congress has lifted its voice affirmatively and patriotically, and properly so, to the requisitions of the President and Cabinet heads of the executive branch of our Government when called upon to furnish appropriations of money in unprecedented amounts never before heard of in the history of nations.

The American people likewise have responded patriotically to the flotations of liberty loans and have responded cheerfully, readily, and enthusiastically to the purchase of an amount aggregating $17,000,000,000, not because of any inducement for investment, but absolutely for the purpose of showing their determination to do all required of them to win the war. It can also be said that the same motive can be applied to the cashing into the Federal Treasury a sum reaching close to a billion more for war-savings certificates and thrift stamps.

The American people have been called upon to support the Red Cross and numerous other sources of donations, and where within the territorial limits of our great Republic has there not been a ready and most generous response?

We are a wealthy Nation; our people are the wealthiest in the world. Our great wealth is not brought to us in ships or any other process of transportation from foreign lands. Our leaders of industry and all those under their direction correctly contend, as we must all contend, that our great wealth is produced by the application of labor and capital to all the forces and resources which God and nature have so abundantly placed within our territorial limits.

The past 50 years of our existence has been one of industrial development exceeding all the previous years of our national life, and yet not until we became involved in the present European conflict did we fully realize the uncovered resources of the public domain. Neither did we realize the accomplishment of industrial activity to turn out in so short a time the vast amount of munitions of war, food, and inestimable supplies, not only for our own national defense but also to supply the needs of all our allies.

Captains of industry, backed up by the ready response of labor, produced these American-made goods from American products by American labor in American workshops over which flew the American flag, and the sustenance of this vast industrial army was produced by the American farmer from American soil.

The splendid teamwork of the manufacturers and their employees, brushing aside self-interest, and even in the whirl of many concessions to be made by the employer as to high remuneration and responded to by concessions of workmen, this magnificent cooperation demonstrated to the entire world the ability, intelligence, and the productiveness of our industrial institutions.

During the months of our active participation in the war our industrial activities have been strained, caused by the great haste with which results were to be accomplished, yet by confidence and unselfish cooperation, the elimination of conflict, our goods were produced and produced with such astonishing rapidity as to be almost beyond conception.

It is our duty to keep a friendly understanding between employer and employee, and thus prevent any friction unnecessarily between them.

This conflict has had a tendency of bringing men of all walks of life closer together. It has been the means of opening up and the development of many of our national resources.

It should bring to a larger extent a more equitable distribution of wealth and a higher wage scale for our workmen.

Congress has ungrudgingly opened up the public exchequer and allowed the executive branches to have their will.

Whether it has been wisely expended or not must be determined when the people through their Representatives in Congress demand an accounting.

However, I am at the moment more impressed with the difficulties arising by the imposition of the heavy burden of taxes to be levied for lifting the burden.

We have created the debt, now we must create the way to pay it. Do not lose sight of the burdens imposed upon the American people since this war began. We must consistently use and occupy every avenue of revenue that will relieve the taxpayer.

Our industries must keep their wheels and trip hammers in motion, and labor must keep up the high standard it has been capable of maintaining since the war commenced.

Our products must be marketed, but we must produce the products to be marketed.

It is evident during the days, weeks, months, and probably years of reconstruction our markets will supply the wants of the nations of Europe now undergoing reconstruction.

To meet the demands of our consumption and to encourage production, not only of long-established industries, but likewise those which have sprung into existence since the declaration of war against Germany, this Congress must build suitable barriers of protection. As has been well said, "When we have turned our backs to the sea and our faces to the land we have come into our own true inheritance and built up this great and fabulous wealth," and it can be said doubling itself every five years.

One of the channels for the production of revenue is the revision of the tariff that will consistently and reasonably protect, not only for the protection of industry but as a source of revenue income to assist in liquidating the debt incurred during the successful prosecution of this war.

I here insert as a part of my remarks a report from the United States Bureau of Markets.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of buildings in the District of Columbia, $66,500: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized, in his discretion, to enter into a contract for the lease for a period not to exceed five years with an option for a perion of five additional years, of the Commerce Building, now occupied by the Department of Commerce, at an annual rental not to exceed $65,500.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. Is it necessary, in view of the many buildings that have been erected for war purposes during the past months, to authorize the rental of a building for this department at $65,000 per year, when some of these other buildings will presumably be vacated by war bureaus in the near future?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that it is not absolutely necessary, in so far as actual space is concerned, for I am satisfied from the statement made to the committee by the gentleman who was appointed to look into the question of space, that there will be available space, but the gentleman from Massachusetts knows that these buildings are temporary in character, and it is not expected that they will be occupied for an extended period of time. Here is the great Department of Commerce that is occupying a splendid office building on the corner of Nineteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue. The lease expires on June 30 of this year. Some disposition has to be made of that department, and the committee thought in view of the importance of the department and the fact that other departments of the Government are placed in buildings of a permanent character that it would hardly be in keeping with the dignity and importance of the department to place it in one of the temporary buildings.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman would not urge that the dignity of a department would warrant——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I shall place it upon the ground of the very great importance of the department.

Mr. WALSH. Is the department any more important than the War Department and its various bureaus have been during the past two years?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. By no means.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think any of those temporary buildings that have been erected for the War Department and the War Trade Board, and these other bureaus conducting war activities, will be torn down within the next five years?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the War Department and the Navy Department are now located in two new buildings on Potomac Park, but those buildings are not in the class to which I refer. Those buildings, as the gentleman knows, are of a permanent character.

Mr. WALSH. Erected temporarily?

Mr. BYRNS. As to just when they will be disposed of I do not know, but those are really up-to-date office buildings.

Mr. WALSH. How about the Munitions Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The War Trade Building is located down on Fifteenth Street on Government land, and that is a building of more or less durable character.

But the buildings to which I referred are such buildings as are located in Henry Park and Seaton Park and one or two buildings located on leased land near Potomac Park. Those buildings will last 5 or probably 10 years, but they are not of a permanent character.

Mr. WALSH. We have several permanent housing buildings for the activities of the Government during the last two years.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; that is true, and it is expected that these buildings which are more permanent and more suitable will be used during the coming fiscal year, and this bill does not carry any appropriation for rent save this and two or three other items which apply to leases of the Government extending over a period of two or three years.

Mr. WALSH. If that is the case, some of these buildings which were erected for the war activities are of such character that they can be used by other departments of the Government when the need for them on the part of the war activities ceases. Why is it necessary to enter into a lease of five years; why can not you just continue this lease for one year, and perhaps during that time you will find one of these buildings which will be suitable and will come up to the requirements of the dignity and importance of this department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The reason is I fear that it is very likely that the Secretary of Commerce could not possibly enter into his present arrangements for rent for that building if limited to a period of one year. I will say to the gentleman that when this building was first occupied by the Department of Commerce a more favorable lease was secured than had ever been secured for any up-to-date office building. The rent is about 39 cents a square foot. That is much less than is being paid for other buildings in Washington.

Mr. WALSH. That was before the profiteers were getting in their deadly work in the District. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; that lease was made five years ago.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and the profiteer did not begin to run amuck until after we declared war, and then the rents both for business purposes and dwelling purposes began to climb up.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But there were no special conditions five years ago which put rents up here in the city of Washington, and, I say to the gentleman, at that time a lease was entered into by the Secretary of Commerce which was more reasonable than any other lease made by the Government, so far as I know, for a building of this character and description.

Mr. WALSH. But in view of the fact and notwithstanding the fact that the Government has erected many buildings for war activities, some of which are of substantial character and sufficient to house this department, because it secured a very favorable lease five years ago we will disregard the facilities that the Government has erected, and give the owner or owners of this property a renewal of their lease for five years.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If this authority is not given to the Secretary of Commerce the best he can do will be to get one of these temporary wooden buildings here in the city of Washington. Now, I am told in the case of one or two of these buildings it has been necessary to shore them up and to make repairs of doors and windows, and I submit to the gentleman that a department of the importance of the Department of Commerce should not be placed in one of those buildings which necessarily are temporary in character. I may say to the gentleman that there is a strong sentiment in some quarters now that some of these buildings ought not to be occupied at all and that they ought to be torn down at once. I do not subscribe to that. I think they should be continued for a period of several years, or at least until the Government can make some other arrangement, because, in my judgment, the Government ought to house its own employees, but I believe in housing its own employees it ought to provide suitable office accommodations. Now, if this department, merely because its lease has expired, is required to take one of these temporary buildings of the character which I have described, why, then, we will do something for this department that we have not done with reference to any other department of the Government. This department occupies now in this building, I am informed, about 175,000 square feet. Now, I do not know whether they could get that much space in any one particular building or not. In addition, these buildings are liable to fire, they are not fireproof, and there are valuable records, for instance, of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Steamboat Inspection, Navigation, and so forth, in the Department of Commerce, and it seems to me it would be very unwise to transfer those bureaus with those records into a building of that character.

Mr. WALSH. Well, we have had other important departments with valuable records—the War Risk Bureau, scattered around in 13 buildings, the Food Administration and Fuel Administration, and many bureaus of the War Department in those buildings, some of which are more than mere temporary buildings, some of them are on Government land, some of them in the near future, I think, will be likely to be vacated, will be standing idle. I do not know whether any of these will be required to be shored up or not; there are a lot of them it will be necessary, probably, to shore down and destroy. I think the gentleman will find upon inquiry there are some buildings out in the vicinity of the new War and Navy buildings that are of sufficient permanence in their construction which would be suitable for this very important department, and which have facilities for the storage of records and preserving them against fire and other dangers, and it seems to me we ought not to continue this policy of leasing these buildings when the Government has constructed buildings which are sufficiently large and convenient to house the other departments of the Government.

They answer for war purposes, and they were sufficiently permanent in character to house the War Department bureaus and other important bureaus, and it seems to me we ought to make use of them. And it would be cheaper, in my opinion, to continue these buildings and make repairs on them from time to time to add to their permanency of character and construction where they are on Government land and to have them as departmental buildings. I do not believe it is necessary to erect an ornamental structure for any particular department, such as has been done in the case of the Treasury Annex. Now, the Navy Building, we were given to understand, would be a temporary building, but it is more than temporary in its character of construction and it is a very plain building. There are no vast pillars of granite. It is a plain structure, with plenty of light, and I believe there will be plenty of room even in that building.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed it is one of the most desirable Government office buildings in the city. But those two buildings to which the gentleman refers are occupied now entirely by the Navy Department and the War Department. The Navy Department has moved out of the War, State, and Navy Building altogether, with the exception of the office of the Secretary, the Assistant Secretary, and the library.

Mr. WALSH. They have gotten into that new building, and it requires eighteen guides to find them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That building will be required for the most part by the Navy Department, but the building adjoining is used by the War Department, which will need additional space, and it is proposed to use such portion of the other building not needed by the Navy Department to take care of this additional space for the War Department. Mr. Dorr stated that he had had requests for 760,000 square feet.

Mr. WALSH. Who is he?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He is assistant director of munitions. I think that is his position, and he was especially selected by the Secretary of War to take under consideration the question of space in these various buildings which are under the jurisdiction of the War Department. Those requests not only came from the bureaus of the War Department now in rented buildings, but bureaus of the Treasury and other departments. He has allotted some of that space, and he will have an additional amount of space for further allotment. The Bureau of the Census will need a considerable amount of space. It is not proposed to rent a building for the Bureau of the Census, but to place it in one of the buildings down in Seaton Park.

Mr. WALSH. Where is that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is off of Sixth Street.

Mr. WALSH. Is that a fireproof building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not a fireproof building, and the Director of the Census says that he will have to build a fireproof vault for the important census records, because the gentleman can realize that it would be very poor business to collect these records at great expense over the country and bring them here and put them in an inflammable building and have them destroyed overnight.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's understanding from the information he has acquired that the activities of the War Department and the Navy Department in the future are to be such as to require the utilization of all the space in this new building that has been erected down on Potomac Park?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Both of those buildings; yes.

Mr. WALSH. And while we are going to demobilize the Army, we are not going to demobilize the clerical force of these two departments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill reduces the rent of the Government more than $600,000. We absolutely cut out that large amount in the next fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I really believe it would be false economy in the administration of the Department of Commerce to compel them to remove from their present quarters at Nineteenth and Pennsylvania Avenue, a building that was designed especially for the activities of the department, and require them to be moved into various temporary buildings throughout the District.

As the chairman of the committee has said, the concrete buildings in Potomac Park will be utilized and will continue to be needed for the War and Navy Departments. The estimates in this bill for clerical services in the War Department are predicated upon the idea of a standing Army of 500,000 men. We read in the newspapers yesterday where Secretary of War Baker stated before the Committee on Military Affairs that at the present time he would not request the Congress to act upon a permanent policy as to the size of the standing Army during this term of Congress.

But in this bill the authorizations for clerks is predicated upon the idea of a standing Army of 500,000 men. With that as a basis, with a Navy that is going to surpass that of Great Britain, and with an Army of 500,000 men, the clerical force necessary to maintain those activities will need all the space in the concrete buildings in Potomac Park. Now, where is the Department of Commerce, which is now housed in a fireproof building, going to be housed? There are a lot of temporary buildings that sooner or later will have to be removed. I think the policy of the Government should be, as to those temporary buildings, to utilize them during their serviceable life—10 years perhaps—and when they reach that stage of depreciation that the cost of repair is greater than it is advisable to continue, then to discontinue them, and in the meantime provide for permanent modern office buildings, not ornate Government buildings.

To remove the activities of the Department of Commerce to these temporary buildings would cost the Government perhaps $60,000 to $75,000; but the damage to the service that would be wrought could only be estimated in hundreds of thousands of dollars. Now, as to this lease, the landlord here is not seeking to increase the rate, which was regarded as a reasonable rate five years ago, when this lease was first negotiated. When the war started and the Government was confronted with the necessity of getting additional buildings an attempt was made to have buildings erected by private contractors, but the rental asked by the backers of these projects was double what the Government had been paying for such character of buildings, such as those occupied by the Department of Justice, the Department of Labor, and the Department of Commerce. If the landlord had attempted to increase the rate on the plea that these buildings had actually gone up in value by reason of the increased cost of construction there might be some ground for the complaint now made; but with the landlord willing to enter into a lease for five years, with the option in the Government for a further lease for five years at the old rate, I can not see where there is any criticism justified in the department remaining in a structure exactly suited to its needs.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The gentleman says it was based on the idea that we should have an Army of 500,000 men. Who has authorized an Army of 500,000 men?

Mr. STAFFORD. There has been no congressional authorization of an Army of 500,000, but the War Department officials came before the committee and said that these estimates were based on the idea of a standing Army of 500,000 men.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, that is only temporary.

Mr. STAFFORD. The idea was that that was to be the permanent force. But that is a matter to be determined in the future. I say these estimates were predicated on the idea of having a force of 500,000 men in the next fiscal year.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Are they certain that that will give privates enough so that all the officers will have a job?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not going into a discussion of the need of a standing Army of 500,000 men nor into the discussion of the tendency to have a large number of officers here in Washington, which has the effect of keeping a large number of clerks constantly on the pay roll of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the gentleman says he did not want to discuss the proposition of an Army of 500,000 men, but, nevertheless, he is doing it. The gentleman is a hard-working member of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to admit it.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the Government has not now buildings which it has erected upon its own land of sufficient permanence and character which in the near future will probably be vacated because of the cessation of activities on the part of the bureaus and departments which now occupy them, which will not afford sufficient floor space and protection for the records of the Department of Commerce and its various bureaus?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do. The testimony before the committee shows that the President has appointed the Assistant Director of Munitions to make a survey of all the available space in Government-owned, temporary Government-owned buildings, and buildings erected by the Government on leased land, and he testifies that all that space will be called for by the present activities of the Government during the next fiscal year, without giving any consideration to the Department of Commerce in the housing of its present force other than the Bureau of the Census.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is familiar with the new War and Navy Building on Potomac Park and the Munitions Building, so called, is he not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Quite well.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has been in them, has he not?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have.

Mr. WALSH. And having his familiarity with those buildings in mind, will the gentleman state that during the next five years the Navy Department and the War Department in their activities will require the use and occupancy of each and every one of these entire buildings?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very guarded in making a statement on this floor, because I do not wish to mislead any Member, much less the astute Member from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman is going to answer my question, I will be satisfied to accept that adjective. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. And in the next fiscal year all the Government buildings will be needed for activities other than those of the Department of Commerce, except those of the Bureau of the Census under that department.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Wisconsin is fully aware that because of the war emergency the Government has erected a great number of buildings, some of them more permanent in character than others, and some of them will not be required for the activities for which they were erected, and they will either stand vacant or they will be used by some of these departments that will still want to continue their activities after the necessity for them has passed. Here is an opportunity to house the Department of Commerce in one of these buildings on Government land, which would save to the Government in the next five years some $300,000; and yet the gentleman states that because five years ago there was a landlord fair and just enough to make a reasonable rental rate to the Government, which he has sought to advance for a renewal of his lease, we should continue to lease that building for five years further. I think the truth is that the lease we made five years ago contained a clause giving the Government the option to renew it for five years at the same rental.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, two or three years ago, as I recall, the legislative bill carried an authorization for the Attorney General to enter into a contract for a lease of five years, and the Department of Labor for a similar lease, and it was my suggestion that there should be incorporated a provision giving the Government an option to extend it for another term of five years. That was after we had entered into a lease for the Department of Commerce. But the term of the Department of Commerce was, I believe, for a stated period of five years, without the option of a renewal. At my suggestion in the committee, the option was further incorporated in this authorization.

Permit me to say to the gentleman that these temporary buildings down on New York Avenue, just to the north of the concrete buildings in Potomac Park, are on leased land. I believe that by the terms the lease expires six months after the termination of the war. Certainly there is no provision there for renewal if the landlord does not wish to extend that privilege. Now, for us to move in a haphazard way and say to the Department of Commerce, "You shall find quarters in these temporary buildings, where the whole floor space is all preoccupied by various activities of the Government," would indeed be a short-sighted policy, would be a policy ruinous to the activities of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, still further reserving the point of order, it seems to me this is an unwise policy to pursue with reference to the utilization of buildings that have been erected by the Government upon its own land, and that here is a chance to make a reasonable saving——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WALSH. In the removal of the Department of Commerce into one of these buildings. They are going to be compelled to use one of these buildings apparently for the Census Bureau, and they are going to put that bureau into a building that is apparently not fireproof, and that bureau will have to occupy that building for a considerable length of time. Now, you have erected a number of buildings on Government land, buildings of a sufficiently permanent character, and which can be made fireproof by the addition of fire guards and the installation of fireproof vaults, buildings which will not be removed probably within the next five years, because the gentleman intimates that they could very well remain there for 10 years, and during that time we could repair them and make them available; and if we are going to continue the policy of renting buildings year after year, when we have buildings of our own upon our own land, we might just as well consider that what we have expended for Government buildings has been an utter and sheer waste, outside of the temporary occupancy of those buildings for war bureaus in the conduct of their activities; and I submit that this is not the time to establish the precedent of renewing leases for privately owned buildings for a term of five years, with an option to renew them further for five additional years, no matter how important the department, because we have buildings at present which were erected for war purposes which can be vacated by the 1st of July, and the transfer could be effected by that time. I express serious doubt, whether we have the largest Navy in the world or whether we have a standing Army of 500,000 men, as has been outlined by the War Department officials to the Committee on Military Affairs during the last few years—whether they can in the proper conduct of these departments utilize the entire space of those two new buildings down on Potomac Park. What is going to be the need of the War Department to use the new Munitions Building, so called, simply because we have a standing Army of 500,000 men? Why, we had an Army of over 2,000,000 men on the other side of the water, and even then they did not use all the space in the buildings that they have and they vacated many rooms in the State, War, and Navy Building to which some of these bureaus can very well return. If we are going to keep this immense clerical force here in Washington to carry on these activities during the next five years, then, instead of using the temporary buildings, we will have to increase the rentals and you will have to build more temporary buildings. I submit that here is an opportunity where the Congress ought to indicate a desire on the part of these departments to make use of the Government's own property.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The legislative act of this year makes provision for rental of the Mills Building, the Lemon Building, and various other privately owned buildings. The committee this year absolutely withdrew the authorizations for these buildings, with the desire to force the activities now housed in those buildings to go into these temporary buildings. I believe there is only one instance where we have made provision for rental of private quarters, other than for the three privately owned buildings exclusively used by the three departments. It has been the policy of the committee to force the activities of the Government, so far as possible and practicable, into these temporary buildings. A survey is being made at the present time. That survey shows that it is absolutely impossible to house the Department of Commerce in the available space in the temporary buildings. Now, if in spite of that testimony the gentleman wishes to make a point of order and not to provide any housing for the Department of Commerce, it is his privilege so to do. If the committee had not given very careful consideration to this subject, we would be open to criticism, but we gave it as thorough consideration as was possible and adopted this policy.

Mr. WALSH. I see there is also a provision for rent of quarters for the Department of Justice of $7,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is where there is a lease in existence, where we are obligated to pay the rental, and the same for the Department of Labor. There are two cases where we have leases for five years, where we are obligated to pay. But in every instance where we could force the activities of any department into these Government-owned buildings, we did so by cutting out the appropriation for the rental. Now that is the judgment of the subcommittee after a thorough consideration.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order and offer an amendment: Page 135, line 6, strike out the word "five" and insert in place thereof the word "two," and strike out the words "with an option for a period of five additional years."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 135, line 6, strike out the word "five" and insert the word "two"; and in lines 6 and 7 strike out the following: "with an option for a period of five additional years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it for the purpose of asking the chairman a question about the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. I am informed that in that bureau there is maintained a quasi civil-service commission, well organized and officered, and at a great expense; that tney hold examinations, or alleged examinations, frequently; and without giving information to the applicants as to the monetary qualifications that every representative as a commercial agent must have before receiving the appointment; that to hold these examinations they invite men to come from all over the country, at great expense, have the result of the examination pigeonholed and do nothing more about it. The appointments are said to be made from men who have the financial qualifications prescribed by the secretary; that it is stated by the secretary that men must have private means to be appointed, and that men without private means of from $5,000 to $10,000 a year of their own are not appointed. If this is so, why is a highly organized and expensive civil-service bureau maintained in that department for the purpose of holding these mock examinations? Is the sole purpose that of giving positions to this body of examiners?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, the use of any kind of a regulation, the gentleman must know, is to prevent the fellow from getting the job that they do not want to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Men are invited from all over the country to take these examinations, without having it first stated to them that they must have an income of from $5,000 to $10,000 a year, even though they be otherwise qualified.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the commercial attachés and agents who are appointed for foreign service receive salaries, as I remember it, ranging from $3,500 to $8,000 a year. In addition to that they are given a subsistence of $5 a day. I agree that in some cases the amount allowed for subsistence may not be entirely sufficient, but I fail to understand that it is necessary for one to have a private income in order to accept one of these positions. I do not understand that is necessary, because the salaries range from $3,500 to $8,000 a year, outside of their subsistence.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have here a letter from a responsible man with respect to these examinations. He says:

In the case of the position of commercial agents, I have not only been reliably informed that the chief of the bureau has stated that men are required for this position who could draw on their private income to the extent of five or ten thousand dollars a year in order to maintain their positions, but I have a letter to this effect signed by Secretary Redfield.

That seems to be rather definite and conclusive upon the matter of requiring a financial qualification.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I should be very much surprised if the information of the gentleman from Kansas is correct, because it has never been called to the attention of the committee. The Secretary of Commerce has insisted that the committee should raise the per diem for subsistence from $5 to $8 a day upon the ground that it is impossible for some of these agents in foreign fields to provide subsistence for $5. The committee has declined to do that, but it has never been stated in support of that proposition by the Secretary of Commerce that it had become necessary for him to choose from those who have private incomes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That question aside, is it necessary to maintain a bureau in the Department of Commerce for the purpose of making these examinations, a highly expensive bureau? Why not make these examinations through the regular Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That I would say to the gentleman would be impractical for the reason that these foreign agents are required to have peculiar qualifications. It was for that reason that the law was enacted that the Department of Commerce should appoint these agents after conducting an examination to determine their fitness and qualifications. These men have to be well versed in the language of the country to which they are assigned. They have to have the necessary business experience and training in order to enable them properly to perform the duties.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The writer of this letter refers to a case of this kind:

In the case of one man who took the examination for special agent, who had studied the trade relations in certain South American countries, a man who has a wide knowledge of affairs in those countries, and speaks the language of those countries fluently, he was informed that, in the opinion of one of the officials of the bureau, his personal appearance did not measure up to the standards set by the bureau. In this connection I might mention that some of the men who have been selected and sent abroad to fill these positions, and probably selected without ever having been required to take the examination for the position as announced have been the butt of ridicule for travelers abroad, as, for example, one whose ability was evidently measured by the amount of whisky he could drink and another one who appeared immediately after his arrival in the Orient in the garb of a native.

These are the men who are passed by this examining commission in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman does not think that a civil-service examination would necessarily prevent anything like that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the gentleman stated that the idea was to select men peculiarly fitted for those positions.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the idea.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And I am now calling attention to the peculiarly well-fitted men who have been selected by this highly organized commission.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the idea, I will say to the gentleman; and the Secretary of Commerce conducts an examination more rigid than any that could be possibly conducted by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why more rigid?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the same policy is pursued in the State Department. Consular agents are not selected after a civil-service examination, but after an examination held by the department in order to determine their qualifications and fitness for the positions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman know the expense of maintaining this examining commission in the Department of Commerce?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I see that the paragraph is not itemized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think there is any expense, because these examinations are held, as the gentleman has stated, both orally and written, and under the direct supervision of the Secretary of Commerce. In fact, he conducts the examination. There is no expense involved.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, replying to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], is it not a fact that the State Department must select consuls without the aid of the Civil Service Commission, because under the Constitution Congress would not have the power to direct the selection of consuls by civil-service examination, whereas in the Department of Commerce it is perfectly competent for us to direct that the selection be made under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not question the fact that Congress can dictate just how these appointments shall be made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, does not the gentleman from Tennessee think, in the interest of economy, we should provide that the consular agents and attachés should be examined by the Civil Service Commission rather than by an organization of men maintained in the Department of Commerce?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not, for two reasons: In the first place, there is no expense involved, and therefore the question of economy does not arise.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am informed there is expense.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And, in the second place, I am earnestly of the opinion that the examination which is now being conducted by the Department of Commerce in reference to those appointed to this service is one that is much more rigid and much more calculated to bring out the question of whether or not one is fitted properly to represent our Government in foreign countries, because, the gentleman will understand, particular care and attention should be given to the selection of these commercial agents in foreign countries, for much depends upon their tact and diplomacy——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). As well as upon their business qualifications.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. FLOOD. Is it not a fact that in the written examination of these applicants for commercial attachés the Civil Service Commission has representatives upon the board?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no information on that. I am asking what information the Committee on Appropriations has with reference to these examinations, which I am informed are conducted by the Department of Commerce at great expense.

Mr. FLOOD. They have similar examinations in the State Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, since he has brought the question up, that the Civil Service Commission does have a representative who is on the examining board with the Secretary of Commerce and others.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman have an inquiry made of the Secretary by telephone before we get through with this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I shall be very glad to inform the gentleman later.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that very much is expended in the matter to which the gentleman from Kansas has called attention. I think, however, that there is a lack of coordination between these two great departments, and that lack of coordination is costing the Government a great deal of money. For example, in 1915 the Secretary of Commerce received for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce $225,000, and the State Department had for that purpose—that is, for clerk hire here in Washington as carried in the legislative bill—$352,260, making a combined appropriation of $577,260 for the same purpose. This year the State Department asks for $1,577,140 for clerks here in Washington as compared with a quarter of a million five years ago, and the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce asked for $1,324,000. Now, officials in the State Department came before the committee and said they could do all the work they are now doing and also that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce were doing, and we asked why they did not get together and economize, and why the President did not enforce the provisions of the Overman Act and cut out this duplication. They gave us no real information and furnished no suggestions to aid the committee in any way to work out some economy.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then, why did not the committee force the consolidation?

Mr. GOOD. Well, the committee can not do that very well.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why not?

Mr. GOOD. It is easier said than done.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Cut off the appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. That is still easier said than done. This is an executive function; it is not a legislative function. We can not do that without doing some harm perhaps to commerce.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Simply order the transfer from one to the other and stop this duplication.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. The Acting Secretary of State, when he appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs last month, said that he realized that there was this difficulty between the Department of Commerce and the Department of State and that the Department of Commerce and the Department of State ought to get together and that he proposed to see that they did get together, and his suggestion was that representatives of the two departments should come before the gentleman's own committee, the Committee on Appropriations, and thrash the thing out right then and there. Now, this does not look like the way to get at it. Does the gentleman know whether or not that is to be done?

Mr. GOOD. No; it has not been done, and I do not think it will be done, and it ought not to be done that way. We can not, in the nature of things, get all the information necessary so as not to do some injustice; but I took the floor simply to say that if the President did not do it and this department did not do it, that when they came before the House next year I proposed to oppose an appropriation in both instances until they did do it. I do not know who is right, but I know these departments ought to get together. We passed a law giving the President the power to coordinate and cut out these duplications of service, and if they do not get together the commercial interests can then point their finger to those two great departments and to the Executive as the reason why their appropriations may be in danger.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Did not Congress by its act create the commercial attachés?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. And has not Congress——

Mr. GOOD. And Secretary of State Bryan came before us and said it was a pretty good thing. It was done with his acquiescence and consent, and, if I mistake not, at his request.

Mr. FLOOD. It was done by Congress and it has been carried by Congress every year, notwithstanding it is subject to the point of order, and the gentleman can not blame the Executive and can not blame the State Department; he has simply to blame the Committee on Appropriations for carrying this appropriation year after year—an item which is increased from year to year for these commercial attachés—which is subject to the point of order and which has not been made.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To perform a great service in the interests of commerce.

Mr. GOOD. The Secretary of State came before the committee and the Secretary of Commerce also came before the committee and asked for the legislation. These departments got what they asked for. Of course, Congress did not know these departments would, if given the new places they ask for, duplicate the work of each.

Mr. FLOOD. And the Secretary of State has not been before the committee for two or three years, has he?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether the appropriation is increased in this bill over that in the current law for the commercial attachés or the foreign-commerce work?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is. I will say to the gentleman it is increased in the case of commercial attachés about $40,000, and in the case of the extension and promotion of our commerce generally about $300,000 or more. In other words, the total appropriation for this bureau carries something like $900,000. The appropriation for the current bill is about $550,000.

Mr. FLOOD. The appropriation for this bureau is merely the appropriation for the State Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. How much does this bill carry?

Mr. FLOOD. For foreign service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is for foreign service distinctly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentlemen proceeding, but I would like to use my time just for a moment.

I made the inquiry because of an incident that recently occurred. A friend of mine in Chicago, a man of high reputation, was going, with his wife, to make a trip to Panama, and wanted to go on to South America; not directly in the interests of commerce, but any information that he would acquire would probably have been for the benefit of commerce. The State Department informed me that it would not grant him a passport unless a physician would certify that he wanted to make the trip to South America for his health. I replied to the department that doubtless he could get a certificate from a physician to that effect, but if he did we would all know it was false, because no man would go down through the Torrid Zone in South America for his health, from Chicago especially. And a passport was refused him. Now, upon what theory do we largely increase the appropriation in order to extend our commerce with South America, in one department, and then have another department of the Government refuse to permit a man to go there? It seems an oddity. And I make the inquiry so that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs may, if he will and has the opportunity, give us the information as to what the regulation is and why it is, when the Diplomatic appropriation bill comes before the House. It seems to me utterly incongruous to largely increase the appropriations for foreign commerce and then refuse passports to reputable, high-charactered citizens to make a trip to South America, where there is no question involved about the war.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of storage space outside the Commerce Building, $2,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order that this is new legislation, I would like to ask a question or two of the chairman. What is it that is to be stored outside?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. These are some records that have accumulated in the department. There is no place in which to store them. They are important, and it is very inadvisable to destroy them or permit them to become lost, and for that reason this provision is carried for $2,000 to provide a building where they may be stored.

Mr. LITTLE. In view of the fact that we have buildings around here to burn and that we are threatening to tear down, and which would required a great deal of money to tear down, does not the gentleman think it would be better if we would put this stuff in some building of the Government for which we would not have to pay rent?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is one trouble with some of these buildings—they might burn; and, besides, those buildings are to be used for office purposes.

Mr. LITTLE. If I would undertake to find a vacant but useless building that is already belonging to the Government, would the committee be satisfied with that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Here is the statement made with reference to this, which shows that it is a matter of economy to rent this space:

At the present time—

Says Dr. Havenner, who is chief clerk of the department—

we are very much congested in the Commerce Building. We have in there what might be called a good deal of dead storage, much of which is taking up office room, room for which we pay, including upkeep, probably 50 cents a foot. If we were given this item of $2,000, we could move a great part of this storage out to other places, and it would give us room in the Commerce Building for at least 75 additional clerks.

Then I asked him just what the records were, and he stated:

It consists of files and documents for all of the bureaus housed in the building, duplicate registers and enrollments for the Bureau of Navigation, census schedules from the First Census down to the last, Census Office cards that we can not destroy at this time, etc.

Then he was asked:

Have you any building in view?

He said:

No, sir; we have nothing in view at this time, but the limitation placed by statute upon the rent we will pay would be not to exceed 25 cents a foot for storage space. We are figuring that with $2,000 we ought to be able to get probably 10,000 square feet outside.

That is what they have done. They now have this building and these important records are stored in it.

Mr. LITTLE. I notice he speaks of it as "dead storage." Whose building is it into which this goes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is located at Twenty-sixth and E Streets NW.

Mr. LITTLE. It is the old brewery building, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is called the Heurich Brewing Co.'s stables.

Mr. LITTLE. Is not most of this stuff, in fact, placed in practically fireproof boxes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. LITTLE. Most of that stuff is.

I think, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we have so much vacant space in these buildings of which we are going to tear a lot down, I feel it is my duty to make the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. LITTLE. That this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. That it is not provided for by law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will state that it is not subject to a point of order any more than the previous provision.

Mr. LITTLE. That would have been subject to a point of order if the point of order had been made.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The proviso, I submit, would have been subject to a point of order authorizing a lease of five years, but not for five years additional. But certainly there is every authority for Congress to make an appropriation to house one of the Government departments. Clearly that authority exists.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the Department of Commerce the authority under existing law to rent buildings for departmental purposes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was just saying, Mr. Chairman, that clearly there is a right on the part of Congress and authority under the law to make provision for the housing of the Government departments. Otherwise, we would be at the mercy of any Member who chose to make a point of order. If we have the right to provide for Government clerks, a right to provide for the personnel of the departments, certainly we have the right to provide a place for them to do their work and a place where the documents of the department can be stored.

Mr. LITTLE. I am not familiar with any statute that the Congress has enacted that authorizes us to rent a brewery to put some waste paper "dead storage" in. If the gentleman can put his finger on such a statute, that will be satisfactory to me. If not, I would like to have a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the Department of Commerce has been created by law and ought to have the right to provide for the housing of its employees and the storage of its papers; that is implied.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but you provide that there shall be a Committee on Woman Suffrage, and that implies the power to keep a clerk, but in fact it does not, according to the Chair's rulings. If you can imply a power of this kind from a statute such as you speak of, there is not a thing in the world you can not hitch on to this appropriation. There either is a law authorizing this or there is not, and I am going to put the Chair on record about it. The Chair can rule as he pleases, of course, but the facts remain.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the duty of the Chairman to follow the rules of the House.

Section 9 of the act establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor, approved February 14, 1903, provides that the Secretary shall be authorized to expend for the rental of appropriate quarters for accommodation of the department as Congress may from time to time provide. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] raised a question yesterday with reference to Hawaiian circuit court judges, and we passed over the item in order that some information might be secured with reference to it. I ask unanimous consent that we return to that item now.

Mr. WINGO. Before the gentleman does that, I want to ask the gentleman what effort has been made and what is the program with reference to getting out of these apartment houses and high-class places into vacant buildings that we now have?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Secretary of War has selected, in cooperation with the heads of other departments, Mr. Darr, to take into consideration the allotment of space in the temporary buildings that come under the jurisdiction of the War Department. This bill now under consideration cuts out more than $600,000 for rent paid this year for buildings in which Government departments are housed.

Mr. WINGO. How many apartment houses does this cut out?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know that it cuts out any apartment houses, because I understand that those apartment houses were paid for out of lump sums carried in some of these Army appropriations.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman thinks these apartment houses come within that classification?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. They have had a great deal of space down there ever since this munitions building was first occupied—a great deal of vacant space.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Darr says he has requests for 761,000 square feet of space. This bill, if adopted as recommended by the committee, will provide that all of the governmental activities of the departments shall be housed in these temporary buildings so far as it is possible to do it, and we give the President the right to allot this space.

Mr. WINGO. They have had enough space at the munitions building to take care of all the activities they have and those of some other departments, too. There has never been a time when the munitions building has been full or anywhere near full, and it is a very fine building. You may call it a temporary building, but I do not think it is of a very temporary character.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What building is that?

Mr. WINGO. I mean the new War Department building. They have never filled up their space down there. One room down there has very nearly as much available space as this Chamber affords, about half as wide and about as long, and I noticed that only five persons were occupying it the other day, and they were not at all busy. There are vacant rooms all over that building. The War Department can not use all of it. Why not make some provision whereby some of these offices of the Treasury can go in there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We did make provision for those activities. The department has had space in a great many private buildings in Washington, in the old Geological Survey Building on F Street, and in other places occupied by various bureaus, and those forces are now being transferred to the building to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. WINGO. That is the reason I am complaining. I have known all the time, upon personal investigation, that there has been space wasted in the munitions buildings, and yet they were paying high and exorbitant rents for other quarters, and it ought to be stopped. Our committee has said, "Hands off; leave that to the Committee on Appropriations." I would like to know what the Committee on Appropriations has done.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill does not go into effect until July 1 this year. The committee has absolutely cut off all rent which is being paid here by the Government in the city of Washington which heretofore has been carried in this bill, with the exception of certain buildings that are now under lease by the Government for a period of years.

Mr. WINGO. Why does not the Government get a release, which they can do under the contract? There is a demand for all these buildings. The Government could utilize the vacant space in its own buildings.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think these leases provide for cancellation simply because one party may not desire to continue the use of the building.

Mr. WINGO. But other people have found persons who are glad to take the leases over. Take the Southern Building, for example. There never was any excuse for the Government going into that building. Three or four different tenants have been in there in the past year or two. They can sell their lease at a premium in a lot of these high-class buildings.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think where that is true it ought to be done, undoubtedly. I think the gentleman is clearly correct. But the gentleman will understand that on this bill, which goes into effect next July, we can not handle that situation.

Mr. WINGO. If you can not handle it, why can you not? You say to the Expenditures Committee that they must not butt in, that the Committee on Appropriations can do that; but when we ask the Appropriations Committee to do it on this bill they say, "This is for the next fiscal year, and we can not do anything."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no; if the gentleman will read the hearings this year he will find that the committee went into it very fully.

Mr. WINGO. I do not find where they have cured the evil I am complaining of.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I refer the gentleman to section 9 of this bill.

Mr. WINGO. I have read that section.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have a request for unanimous consent to return to page 108.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chairman first state the request of the gentleman from Tennessee. He asks unanimous consent to return to the first paragraph on page 108. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I have investigated the matter, and I find that the Hawaiian Territorial law provides that the Territorial legislature may designate the number of courts in Hawaii and also the number of judges to administer those courts. There are now five circuit courts in Hawaii, three judges who preside in the first circuit and one each in the other four circuits, making a total of seven circuit judges. The act specifically names the number who shall constitute the supreme court, and for that reason they are specially set forth here in this bill; but inasmuch as the act leaves it to the Territorial legislature to designate the number of circuit judges this bill has never sought to carry the exact number. The appropriation, of course, can be utilized only for the purpose of paying those who are legally appointed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I understand the gentleman to say that this is the same phraseology that has been carried year after year for this appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Exactly the same.

Mr. TREADWAY. And that the only uncertainty is the number of judges who may be designated by the Legislature of Hawaii to fill the various circuits.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct. These circuit judges are appointed by the President, and the laws require that they shall be citizens of the Territory when appointed.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman stated a moment ago, in answer to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], that this bill saved $600,000 rent. I would like to know how much the bill carries now for rent in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Something over $200,000. I will tell the gentleman exactly in a moment.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations one more question in relation to the judges in Hawaii?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If I may answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia first, then I will yield to the gentleman. This bill eliminates in rent here in the District of Columbia $613,620.88. It carries for rent the sum of $208,004.12.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for another question in that connection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The provision of section 9 to which the gentleman refers contains this provision:

> Appropriations for rent of office space, contained in this or any other act, for the fiscal year 1920, except for space under lease for a term of years expiring after June 30, 1919, shall be available only for obligation for rental of such office space in the District of Columbia as may be determined by the President to be necessary in addition to the space available in Government-owned buildings.

The exception contained in that provision lets through the very abuses that I want to stop. I do not know how the language could be framed, but the committee ought to be able to devise some way by which they can compel these departments to cancel the leases they have in expensive office buildings at a time when they can find plenty of persons to take the leases off their hands, and when the owners of the buildings would be glad to cancel their leases because they can get a higher rental, and these different bureaus ought to be put into the office buildings that the Government owns.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman can offer any more specific language, we would be glad to have the gentleman offer an amendment to that effect. This leaves the proposition with the President of the United States.

Mr. WINGO. For everything except what you have got under lease.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly the United States Government, merely because Congress has the power to do it, ought not to abrogate a contract that it has made.

Mr. WINGO. I am not advocating the abrogating of contracts.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. When we have leases upon buildings here in the District of Columbia which extend to 1921, 1922, and 1923, in some instances, certainly the United States Government should in good faith carry out its contracts.

Mr. WINGO. Nobody has proposed that it shall abrogate those contracts. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be hard for me to get the floor here to offer my amendment.

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

> Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 135, strike out lines 10 and 11.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I make the point of order that we have passed that paragraph.

Mr. LITTLE. No; we have not.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to debate his amendment?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, here is a splendid chance for Congress to save a little of the people's money. An immense amount of money is allowed to dribble away by just such small items as this. Here is an appropriation of $2,000 for the rent of storage space outside the Commerce Building. Every man on this floor knows perfectly well that the Government has ample room in this town to store away any documents that it has anywhere.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Not now.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman makes the statement that everybody knows this. I do not know it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I will take the gentleman by the hand and lead him to them, if it will help him. Everyone knows that you have plenty of empty buildings, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has given the example of the Munitions Building. What excuse is there for spending $2,000 for putting away a lot of dead stuff, as they said themselves in their report, when you can save that money and put it in people's pockets, where it belongs, and put the stuff in some building you threaten to tear down because you do not need it? If such a thing should happen in private business, the man who did it would, of course, be discharged. The Military Committee knocked in the head of the barrel and asked everybody to help themselves and now the Appropriations Committee want it to dribble out at the spigot, a little $2,000 stream. There is no sense or justice or equity in it. There are buildings around here to burn, places crying for somebody to fill them, and yet you want to spend $2,000 taking care of some old brewery.

Mr. DYER. Oh!

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from Missouri says "Oh!" I can well understand why he says that, but I could show him buildings where all this stuff could be stored. This is a plain, ordinary matter. The only question is whether you want to waste $2,000 or whether you want to save $2,000 to the taxpayers. This money does not grow on trees. People have to pay it and have to work hard to pay it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know just how much it would cost the Government to move this stored material?

Mr. LITTLE. I expect that it would cost $50.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I expect that it would cost the full amount of this appropriation.

Mr. LITTLE. Then $2,000 would cover it and that would be the end of the rent.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is it the gentleman's idea that these buildings in Seaton and Henry Parks, and on privately owned land down here in Potomac Park, are going to be maintained indefinitely for a great period of years in the future, or that in the course of a very few years they will be torn down?

Mr. LITTLE. I suppose such of these buildings as are fit for storage will be maintained as long as we have the stuff like this to put in them, and as far as spending $2,000 to move the papers is concerned, it could only be spent on the theory of and by the same men who suggested this $2,000. Nobody else would spend that much money on it. These files never will be used. Put them in some Government building you threaten to tear down and save the cost of dismantling them and save $2,000 a year indefinitely. There is enough of spending without this. It will come in handy some pay day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I fear that my good, dry friend from Kansas——

Mr. LITTLE. Not any drier than you are now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, but I have a stock in store, and I do not think the gentleman will publicly announce that he has any. [Laughter.] I fear, as I was about to say, that he has some prejudice to this building that was formerly utilized for the brewing of beer, and is now utilized by the Department of Commerce for storing its old useless files and papers. Anyone who is acquainted with the character of the construction of the temporary buildings in Henry Park and on the leased land to the north of the concrete buildings in Potomac Park that the War and Navy Departments occupy, knows that that character of construction is not suited for storage purposes. In fact, the testimony shows that many of these buildings will have to be repaired because they were erected with green lumber under the exigency of war.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not say that the Munitions Building is erected out of green lumber.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, that is a concrete building; but all of the other buildings in Henry Park have been erected out of green lumber, from the first $2,000,000 that was appropriated for the construction of buildings in Henry Park, in October following the declaration of war.

Mr. WINGO. How long do these experts figure it will take for the defects to appear by reason of green lumber construction?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether green lumber or seasoned lumber was used the fact is that they are temporary buildings in Henry Park, other than the Munitions Building, which is erected of concrete, and they are unsuitable for storage purposes. As a matter of fact, the Census Office is contemplating taking possession of the Munitions Building, and even there they will have to put in some solid foundations to provide for the machinery that will be needed in operating the various punching and registering machines.

As was suggested by the chairman of the committee, it would be indeed false economy not to continue $2,000 as rental for storage in a building that can support heavy weights of paper, the removal of which would result in the cost of many thousand dollars. Certainly the Secretary of Commerce, who is asking for the space, would not go to these quarters for storage purpose unless he thought it was an economical proposition. We pay only 25 cents a square foot for the use of this abandoned brewery, and the gentleman's proposition is to utilize space in a modern concrete building worth 50 to 75 cents, and where the Government is paying in private office buildings as high as $1.25 a square foot. It is false economy that is being advocated by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. How does it happen that this end of the Committee on Appropriations says this is a very valuable concrete building and that the other gentleman on the Appropriations Committee tells us that there are not any buildings fit to put this stuff into? The gentlemen ought to get together.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had read the hearings and was acquainted with the character of construction of the respective buildings he would not ask that question, because there are temporary buildings of wooden construction and there are so-called temporary buildings of concrete construction. Those of concrete construction are admittedly strong enough for storage purposes, but they are designed especially for office purposes and their space is worth to the Government to-day from 50 cents to 75 cents and $1 a square foot, and the gentleman wishes to utilize that for storage purposes instead of paying 25 cents a square foot for this.

Mr. LITTLE. How did the gentleman from Tennessee get the idea that the Government had no space to put it in that was fit to hold it? Why did not the gentleman give the information before?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have now given the gentleman information, if he sees fits to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commissioners of conciliation: To enable the Secretary of Labor to exercise the authority vested in him by section 8 of the act creating the Department of Labor, and to appoint commissioners of conciliation, for per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4, traveling expenses, and not to exceed $12,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, $175,000.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. In lines 9 and 10, where it provides for the appointment of commissioners of conciliation, for per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4, and so forth, can the gentleman tell me what these commissioners receive outside of the $4?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They receive a per diem salary which amounts to from $8 to $15 per day—between those figures.

Mr. DYER. In other words, the Secretary can make it $8 or $15?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DYER. My understanding is that he makes it $15, and they get $4 besides, which makes it $19. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; they get $4 for subsistence; but I will say to the gentleman that most of them receive between $8 and $10 a day. There are only two who have received $15 a day. There are 14 receiving $11—I am speaking for the fiscal year 1918—17 who receive $10 a day, and 2 who receive $8.

Mr. DYER. And they get $4 in addition to that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For subsistence.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman know how much will be expended in the current law for this class of work?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, there was expended for the fiscal year 1918 a total of $173,584.52.

Mr. DYER. That was the appropriation, practically?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. Now, the estimate for the next fiscal year was $250,000, and the committee has cut it down to $175,000.

Mr. DYER. I think, Mr. Chairman, the committee has acted very wisely in cutting it down; in fact, it ought to be cut down considerably yet. My understanding is that these commissioners at the present time and probably for the last two years have been selected without much regard to their qualifications or their knowledge of labor questions or of settling labor disputes. In the main, as I understand it, they have been men who have held public office in the past, including ex-Members of Congress, who when they have been retired by the people have gone to the Department of Labor and been put on the pay roll to receive all the way from $11 up to $19, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee—men some of whom in private life can earn about $2.50 to $3 or $4 a day. Those are the class of men that in some instances the Department of Labor has been appointing to these positions. What they have accomplished, if the records and facts could be laid before the House, in settling disputes shows that they have not even earned $2.50 a day, whereas the department pays these exorbitant salaries for no other purpose, as a general thing, than to put upon the pay roll men who have been relieved by the people.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman from Missouri think that the appropriation ought to be largely increased in view of the fact there will be so many retired Members from the Democratic side of the House, in order to do in the future as they have done in the past—take care of those retired Members in this department?

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that is evident from the recent election and from what will probably happen from time to time. There ought to be something, Mr. Chairman, by which this committee could check up these expenses. The people are being taxed up to the very limit. The new revenue bill which will become a law shortly is increasing the taxes and burdens upon the people to keep in office men that have been appointed to soft jobs by this Bureau of Conciliation. They do not know how to settle any disputes; very few of them know anything about labor conditions. They have been in Congress, some of them, and have held other offices in various places, but they have not any knowledge, as a general proposition, of labor. They do not settle labor disputes, but, in the main, these men have been appointed because they have been recommended by Democratic politicians and not by labor organizations of repute or by capital and business interests. Both sides are entitled to have competent men act as conciliators, not only capital and business interests but the labor interests as well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. May I submit a request for unanimous consent to close debate?

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to have a few minutes on this; I have not taken up the time of the committee on this bill, and I would like to be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to have five minutes on this, as this matter is important to my district.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. On this bill?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. SNYDER also rose.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 27 minutes, 2 minutes for myself and the rest to be distributed among the gentlemen who have arisen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 27 minutes, 2 minutes for himself and the other 25 minutes to be distributed between the gentlemen who have arisen—Mr. NOLAN, Mr. SNYDER, Mr. LITTLE, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at the lack of information displayed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] regarding the activities of the Division of Conciliation in the Department of Labor. I think the work of this bureau is of too much importance to the people of this country, both capital and labor, to make it a partisan question. Now, the gentleman, in the first place, did not know a thing about the compensation of these men or he would not make this statement here.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. NOLAN. I do, and I am going to say what I know.

Mr. DYER. Did not the gentleman from Tennessee state the fact?

Mr. NOLAN. I am going to state what are the facts.

Mr. DYER. The chairman has already stated them.

Mr. NOLAN. The general pay of conciliators is $10 per diem and $4 for expenses, railroad fare and berths.

They get $14 a day; in other words, for traveling from one end of this country to the other and settling industrial disputes, and it is the only agency we have here in connection with the Government that has been successful during the war in curbing industrial disputes and troubles. The War Labor Board requires months to take up an individual case, but prior to their taking it up the Department of Labor is compelled to do it, and the machinery of the Division of Conciliation is put into motion; and it is only where they can not settle a dispute that the War Labor Board has been asked to act, both during the war and since the armistice has been signed.

I do not know how many ex-Members of Congress are employed, but I know one or two ex-Members of Congress that have done some very important work in connection with our war activities in this very Division of Conciliation. And I know this, that all the men that are employed are not Democrats by any means. If there is one division under the present administration where Democrats and Republicans and Progressives and others are treated alike, it is in the Division of Conciliation of the Department of Labor, and they have done more to prevent industrial disputes and industrial strife and they have settled more disputes in an industrial way than any other agency we have had either in our National or State Governments.

This is a very useful bureau. If you want to center your attack in a partisan way and do it successfully, pick out some other division or bureau. I want to see this bureau made effective, and more effective. It is one of the best agencies we have to bring about industrial peace between employer and employee.

And, Mr. Chairman, I think this bureau, instead of being criticized, ought to be given all the credit which is due it. It has settled thousands and thousands of disputes both before they took place and after they had gotten started. I think it is ill-timed, especially now when we have a situation in this country that borders on bolshevism, that shows a period of industrial unrest, possibly a period of unemployment coming upon us, to criticize and pick out for our abuse the one agency that is doing more to curb bolshevism and I. W. W.ism than any other agency we have in this Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] is recognized.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I know of no function at this time that is more important than the function of a conciliation bureau. I was interested in the arraignment of the bureau by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]. I confess that I should be very glad if we had more definite knowledge of the personnel of the bureau. I should be very glad, too, if we had a more accurate knowledge with regard to what the bureau has accomplished. But whether or not it has been as effective as it ought to be, my own judgment is that where a conciliation bureau is maintained, so that immediately when there is difficulty in a district and men who are acquainted with the conditions sent there, without waiting for the formality of the gathering of a commission and going through all of the delay that is incident to the bringing together of a commission, there is no more economical way in which to do it than by giving the Department of Labor this power.

If it has not been done honestly, it ought to be done honestly; and I do not know that just because a man has been in Congress he is therefore necessarily incapacitated for any effective service in matters of this kind if he has had experience along those lines. Anyone looking forward to the congestion in the labor market is concerned as to what may arise within the next year. I confess that I am apprehensive of the conditions that may arise in this country, and being apprehensive I think it would be unwise for us without full knowledge, without having investigated the personnel of the men who are engaged in this work, without any knowledge as to how effective they have been, except from general statements, it would be very unwise for us to assail this department by cutting down this appropriation.

Ordinarily it is wise in stress of circumstances such as we have to reduce at every point unnecessary expenses. But I do not believe that this item is an item that should be picked out, unless some man can stand here and show definitely and absolutely that it has been purely a partisan organization, not run with efficiency, but run in the interest of the Democratic Party. I confess until I should be convinced of that fact I would be loath to assail it.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if there is one division of the Department of Labor that has done what you might call excellent work in the last year and a half, it is this conciliation section. I am not familiar with the amount of money that is paid per diem to these conciliators, but on several occasions I have come in personal contact with them, and in each case the matter in question has been handled promptly; and usually when it seemed that a great difficulty would take place in a few days it has been overcome without a strike, which is the most important element in anticipated labor trouble at any time. So, in my judgment, in view of conditions that may arise in this country within the next year or two, and judging from the experience of the past, instead of reducing we ought to maintain what they ask for and, if necessary, give them more. So I favor leaving this item just as it is, without regard to who is employed, whether he might be an ex-Congressman or somebody else, so long as work is performed that is equal to that which has been done by this section in the last 18 months.

What I want to speak about particularly does not seem to be covered by this section. That is the employment bureaus that have been started throughout the country by the Labor Department. These bureaus can do excellent work at this time if they will. There is serious complaint being made to me with regard to their management, however. Of course, it is to be expected that the employment agent in such bureau would be a labor man, but it is also to be expected that he will mete out absolute justice to the men who make application for work, whether they may be union men or whether they may be nonunion men.

One of my experiences is that complaints are being made that the agent will say to the applicant, "Have you got a card?" and if he has not a card the agent has no use for him. So concerns in a community that have had a strike, say, and have gone up against labor organizations and have what they call won out by having beaten the union, and have continued to exist, are being militated against by reason of the fact I have mentioned. And while I am in favor of continuing these bureaus throughout the country at this time, I think that the Labor Department ought to be more careful in the selection of their men and they ought to be very particular in the orders they send out, so that any man who goes to one of those bureaus should have at least the same kind of treatment; that is, each man should have exactly the same kind of treatment, whether he belongs to a union or whether he does not.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that for some months past the Employment Service of the United States has turned over to the various State councils of defense or State employment bureaus the conduct of the employment service in the various States?

Mr. SNYDER. I am not aware of that, but I am aware of the fact that——

Mr. NOLAN. And that in the State of New York the New York authorities are cooperating with their own agencies and the Federal Government in sharing in the expense, but all the employment agents in the State of New York are under the control of the State government directly.

Mr. SNYDER. All I want to warn the Labor Department about here at this time is that, without regard to whether a man is union or nonunion, the Government or the State is paying for this service, and every man in the State should have exactly the same treatment when he is looking for a job. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the attack made upon this bureau of the Department of Labor by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is a most amazing one. He tells the House that the Bureau of Conciliation is maintained for the purpose of affording a refuge for Democrats who lose out in races for Congress. One would imagine that before a responsible and distinguished Member of this House made that assertion concerning the management of an important bureau of the Government he would endeavor to verify his facts.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will yield, I will give him some facts.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman could very readily have secured the facts.

Mr. DYER. I have them now.

Mr. KEATING. All that would have been necessary would have been to consult the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations. On page 977 is a complete list of the commissioners employed by the bureau, with a statement of their former activities, and out of the 37 just 2 are ex-Members of Congress. One is a Republican, a distinguished Republican, the friend of James G. Blaine, minister to Ecuador by virtue of an appointment received from James G. Blaine. The other is a Democrat from the gentleman's own district, and the only thing I know of that can be brought against that gentleman is that he had the temerity to bring a contest on the floor of this House against the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is mistaken. There is no truth in that statement. The gentleman refers to Mr. Patrick F. Gill.

Mr. KEATING. This is the same Gill.

Mr. DYER. No, sir. He is a personal friend of mine.

Mr. KEATING. It is my mistake. I accept the gentleman's statement. Those are the only two Members of Congress who appear on this list. If the gentleman knows of any other ex-Members of Congress, he should submit their names or else withdraw the charge he has made.

Now, as to the work of this bureau, Mr. Kerwin appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and testified—and there is not anything to contradict this assertion—that between April 6, 1917, up to and including the day of the signing of the armistice, November 11, the Division of Conciliation handled 2,439 cases, involving 4,000,000 workers. That is the work that this Bureau of Conciliation has performed, and it is a most important work, perhaps the most important work performed by the Department of Labor.

Now, as to the qualifications of the men who have acted as conciliators, I have had some experience in my home State. We had a great industrial disturbance there. The Department of Labor selected as one of the conciliators Verner Z. Reed, one of the most substantial business men in our State, and a Republican, and Mr. Reed gave his time to the work.

As another conciliator they selected Judge Musser, the former chief justice of the supreme court of the State, a Democrat, and he gave his services. I do not know how much they received, but if they received $15 a day and $4 for subsistence they would not have been properly compensated. They settled a great strike in Colorado, and the settlement of that strike was worth hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars to the people of Colorado.

Upon the pay roll of this department there are just two men drawing $15 a day. One was the former president of the Kentucky Coal Operators' Association, who probably would not enter private employment for $50,000 a year, and the other is the labor commissioner of the State of Texas, and those two men are charged with the important work of maintaining industrial peace in the State of Arizona, sent there representing the President's Mediation Commission; and they are not only charged with that task, but they have performed that task, and during all the period of the war you had no trouble in Arizona, largely because of the efforts of those two gentlemen.

Yet the gentleman from Missouri charges that this bureau was made a refuge for ex-Members of Congress. I think the gentleman owes it to himself, and I am sure he owes it to this House and to the Department of Labor, to withdraw a charge which is without foundation.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, an ancient maxim says—

> For forms of government let fools contest;
> That which is best administered is best.

There is some truth in that, and I think it might apply to this very matter. The theory upon which it is founded is beyond question admirable. We ought to sustain it and improve it. I think possibly it might be improved a little by careful selection. I think I know personally of one instance where a trouble of importance was very materially assisted in its determination by these conciliators. I never was involved in the matter, but I understand that that was the fact.

On the other hand, I regret to say that my attention was challenged to another instance in which a gentleman from this bureau or from some similar institution—at this lapse of time I can not exactly be sure—was concerned, but just before the campaign he appeared and went from factory to factory, I am told, taking an active part in the election. The results were such that I had no cause to complain, but I do not think the idea would be a good one to follow out. Of course I know that it is not the intention of the law that should be done, but is there anything in the law that would tend to prevent that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would say to the gentleman that these conciliators are appointed without respect to what party they belong to.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there anything in the statute in regard to that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is nothing of that kind. There is nothing partisan in the service rendered by these men as conciliators.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, there was something partisan in the case I mention.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure if it were called to the attention of the Secretary of Labor it would have been stopped.

Mr. LITTLE. That is what I rose to inquire about. The Secretary of Labor is the proper person to request attention to such a matter, is he?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. It was not my purpose to call attention to it now. The results in that case were perfectly satisfactory to me. If they kept on in that way and we had the same results, I would not object. [Laughter.]

But since I have the question answered, I trust that there may be some way of impressing upon the department the advisability of explaining to all these gentlemen that their labors are not of a political character, and that they are not sent into districts to interfere with the local situation. The people in most of the districts are quite competent to get along without outside advice, anyway; I know they are in the district I have the honor to represent. I am sure of that. But I want to add this word, that I am highly impressed with the utility of this commission, and I am sure everybody wants to secure the results that it attempts to reach. I think it should be encouraged and upheld, and I hope that in the meantime the Secretary fully understands that it is not a political matter at all, and instructs his representatives accordingly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to consume the two minutes of my time in order to furnish the gentleman from Kansas some information that he called for a moment ago with reference to the examinations that were held for commercial attachés and special agents. These officials are required first to pass a written examination. Then those who pass that competitive written examination are called to Washington for the purpose of standing an oral examination before a board consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and two chiefs of division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and also a representative from the Civil Service Commission. If they pass the oral examination, then they are appointed in the order of their percentage; in other words, those who make the highest percentage are appointed. There is first a competitive written examination.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Held by whom?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is not necessarily held here in Washington. It is held under the auspices of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Civil Service Commission holds that examination?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. If they pass that, they are called here to Washington for the purpose of standing this oral examination.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What does the gentleman say with respect to the requirements of appointees to these positions?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that there are no financial requirements whatever. There is no question or inquiry made as to whether those appointed have a private income, nor is there any necessity for it, since they get salaries ranging from $3,500 to $8,000 a year and are also provided $4 a day for subsistence when traveling. Then I want to say in addition that there is no expense incurred whatever in so far as these examinations are concerned, because the members of the board serve without compensation. That is the only method by which a commercial attaché or a special commercial agent can be appointed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Are consular agents appointed through a similar examination?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are appointed under an examination held by the State Department which is similar to this. I understand the Secretary of Commerce has adopted the same policy with reference to his foreign appointments that has been followed for many years by the State Department in the appointment of consular agents.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Do I understand that these men receive pay throughout the year, whether engaged in conciliation work or not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is now referring to the Board of Conciliation.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; they do not. They are paid only for such time as they actually serve.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem in lieu of subsistence of special agents and employees, and for their transportation; experts and temporary assistance for field service outside of the District of Columbia, to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $8 per day; temporary statistical clerks, stenographers, and typewriters in the District of Columbia, to be selected from civil-service registers and to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $100 per month, the same person to be employed for not more than six consecutive months, the total expenditure for such temporary clerical assistance in the District of Columbia not to exceed $6,000; traveling expenses of officers and employees, purchase of reports and materials for reports and bulletins of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and for subvention to "International Association for Labor Legislation," and necessary expenses connected with representation of the United States Government therein, $80,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Tennessee why the committee took the lid off the subsistence per diem in this item? In the items for commissioners of conciliation you put the lid on at $4 a day for subsistence, but in the item for special agents and employees you take the lid off entirely.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is covered, I will say, by the general law.

Mr. MANN. It is in the current appropriation law. Why is it required in one case and not in the other? Certainly the commissioners of conciliation are entitled to as high a rate for subsistence as special agents and employees.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think that it is required to be stated in this bill in any case. It is mere surplusage wherever it has occurred, because the general law on the subject provides for a per diem rate of allowance not exceeding $4 in lieu of subsistence, and they can not exceed that in any event.

Mr. MANN. That is what I understood. Why do you put it in at one place and take it out in the other?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I stated to the gentleman, I do not think it is necessary to carry it in this bill. It is surplusage wherever it occurs. It could very properly and safely be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Children's Bureau: Chief, $5,000; assistant chief, $2,400; experts—one on sanitation, $2,800, industrial $2,000, social service $2,000, statistical $2,000; administrative clerk, $2,000; editor, $2,000; special agents—1 $1,800, 4 at $1,600 each, 10 at $1,400 each, 12 at $1,200 each; private secretary to chief of bureau, $1,500; clerks—2 of class 4, 4 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 17 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each; copyist; messenger; in all, $106,040.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee why it is that the editor in the Bureau of Labor Statistics is paid $2,500 a year, and the editor in the Children's Bureau $2,000, and why the secretary to the commissioner in the Bureau of Immigration is paid $1,800 a year, while the secretary in the Children's Bureau is paid $1,500?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the lady from Montana will find those inequalities of salaries running entirely through this bill, and I may say that is one reason that influenced the committee in recommending in this bill the creation of a joint commission to take into consideration the reclassification and readjustment of salaries, so as to place them upon a more uniform basis. Of course, I do not know, but I assume that the editor in the Bureau of Labor Statistics has possibly a great deal more to do than has the editor under the Children's Bureau, because it is a much larger bureau and covers a much larger range of subjects. Their publications are decidedly more numerous, and I fancy that the work performed by one is much greater than the work performed by the other.

Miss RANKIN. Was that taken into consideration when these items were inserted?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; that was not taken into consideration. If the lady from Montana will examine the law, I think she will find that the law fixes the salary of the editor in the Children's Bureau at the sum named, and we have allowed for these salaries exactly what was asked by the Chief of the Children's Bureau.

Miss RANKIN. Does it fix the salary for the secretary to the Chief of the Bureau of Immigration? That salary is fixed at $1,800.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That has been fixed heretofore in appropriation bills, and has been carried for a great many years.

Miss RANKIN. The secretary to the Chief of the Children's Bureau has a salary of $1,500.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, but the Bureau of Immigration is also a much larger bureau than is the Children's Bureau. This bill carries for the salary of the private secretary exactly what was asked.

Miss RANKIN. How does the gentleman mean?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the lady from Montana will look at other provisions in the bill, she will find that there are a great number of private secretaries to chiefs of bureaus who receive no more than $1,500 and some of them receive less, and I have in mind one position of a private secretary, carried for the first time in this bill, the secretary to the Chief of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. That was fixed at $1,500, and that is a very important and a very busy bureau also, particularly at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the chairman directed the attention of the lady from Montana to the fact that the salaries paid the editor and the private secretary in the Children's Bureau, as carried in the bill, are the amounts recommended by the head of the bureau. Of course, our committee had nothing to do except to grant her request. We did not seek to reduce those amounts. The position of editor is new, and we carried it at exactly the same salary as the head of the bureau requested to be paid to the person filling that position.

Miss RANKIN. Well, I just asked for information, as there seemed to be a discrepancy.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not want to have the impression go abroad that we were discriminating against the fair ladies who comprise the personnel of the Children's Bureau.

Miss RANKIN. I thank you.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be construed to apply to any purchase or service rendered for the Department of Labor when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed the sum of $25.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I had intended to raise the question when the same item appeared under the Department of Commerce, but my attention was diverted at that time. Why is it proposed to put into the permanent statute a provision that as to those two departments of the Government they are entirely outside of the law in reference to the purchase of supplies by advertisement where the purchase amounts to only $25 in a particular case? In other words, here is a department that may purchase $10,000 worth of stuff in $25 items, if it wishes to do so, without advertising. Now, the law as it stands authorizes the purchase without advertising whenever an emergency exists. Why should we grant to these departments the right to purchase without advertising as a matter of permanent law, which right, so far as I know, does not apply to the other departments, although I might be mistaken about that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My understanding is most all of the other departments have authority to purchase without the necessity of taking bids, some of them to an amount as high as $50.

Mr. MANN. There are some provisions as to various branches of the service. The Lighthouse Service—and I think the Revenue-Marine Service, probably—which has boats and has to purchase very quickly at times certain things, is authorized to purchase within a certain limit and then required to make a thorough report to Congress of every purchase which it makes; but this is absolutely taking the lid off, because if a man wants to—I do not think the head of a department would want to do so—but if some man wants to purchase without advertising, all he needs to do is to buy something every day in the amount of $25; that is a complete transaction and would apply to all small things.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, the Geological Survey and the Reclamation Service have that authority now, and I understand the Department of Agriculture has that authority also.

Mr. MANN. Very likely some of these departments with branches where they are off in the country at some place where they work and not very available to the market have the authority to make purchases without advertising. They frequently have to telegraph for something, and while they could do that under the general law it is a little more convenient to have the power not to have to make a statement that it is an emergency in each case, but this department is not of that character so far as I know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The District government has the same authority, and this department has some large bureaus, like the Bureau of Naturalization, the Bureau of Immigration, where it is necessary to make these small purchases from time to time, and the committee felt it was requiring a needless waste of time and frequently a very great inconvenience and some expense where these small amounts of supplies are necessary to require them to go through the regular formula of making advertisements.

Mr. MANN. Well, the bulk of these supplies are purchased through this supply committee, or does that still exist; I was away for a while?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That still exists, yes; and most of them are purchased through the General Supply Committee.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have great hesitation about it and a good deal of doubt, but I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rent: For rent of buildings and parts of buildings in the District of Columbia for the use of the Department of Labor, $24,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday we passed over the item relating to the Bureau of the Census, and I ask unanimous consent to return to that item, which is found on pages 117 and 118. The gentleman from Massachusetts has reserved the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Massachusetts was called out of the Chamber to attend a hearing in the investigation of the Security League of America he authorized me to say that when this paragraph was returned to that I would withdraw the point of order. The reason why he asked to have the paragraph passed over last evening was to examine the legislative appropriation act for the years 1910 and 1911, to see whether any provision was carried for the statutory roll for those years. It appears that in the appropriation acts following the decennial period for the taking of the Thirteenth Census that no statutory roll was carried, and therefore he desired me to withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether the expenses of the previous census were carried in the legislative bill or in the sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. The large appropriation of $10,000,000 was carried in a special act. The gentleman will recall that President Roosevelt vetoed the first act Congress passed providing for the taking of the Thirteenth decennial census, and it was during the special session of Congress, convened at the instance of President Taft, that in the latter days of the fiscal year a bill was passed carrying $10,000,000 of appropriations, reported, I believe, from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. Well, really, on first blush, I should think the extraordinary expenses of the Bureau of the Census would naturally be carried in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; if the gentleman will permit, in addition to the $10,000,000 which was authorized by that act in the legislative appropriation act for 1911, an appropriation of $2,000,000 was carried for this purpose, and again in the legislative appropriation act for the year 1912 an appropriation of two and a half million was carried, so the appropriations have been heretofore carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation acts.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Retired judges: For salaries of judges retired under section 260 of the Judicial Code (36 Stat. L., 1161), so much as may be necesary for the fiscal year 1920.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask a question or make a remark. I notice the other day that the Senate passed a bill to change the name of a great national park to "Roosevelt National Park." Similar bills have been introduced in the House. At the same time along comes a committee which abolishes, as far as the statute is concerned, a reference to the city named after the Father of his Country. I had supposed I lived in the city of Washington while I attended Congress. Whether there is a legal description of the city or not I do not undertake to say. The post office is "Washington" and the city is "Washington," but the Committee on Appropriations has forgotten "Washington" and abolished the "city of Washington," although they found no difficulty for many years in expending an appropriation providing for personal help in or at the "city of Washington, in the District of Columbia." The Committee on Appropriations found a newspaper article somewhere or acquired information in some other way that there was no legal description of the city of Washington, and they leave it out everywhere in this bill and simply put in "District of Columbia." I think that is a reflection upon the country. Here is the Capital of the Nation, named after the first President, the Father of his Country, and without having said a word to the House in explanation of it the committee eliminates "Washington," apparently forgetful of the history of the country. And I do not know, but I suppose some day some sort of a committee might exist that will forget that there was such a thing as the "Roosevelt National Park."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall that the question was first raised by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], who insisted that under the law there is really no city of Washington. He insisted that the law designated the seat of Government in the District of Columbia and not in the city of Washington.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference. That is no reason why the Committee on Appropriations should follow that course.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And he called it to the attention of the President, and the President dates his proclamations from the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. I think he dates them at the White House. If he leaves out "the city of Washington" he makes a mistake. I think it is a disgrace to the legislators and the Executive to undertake to say that they can not describe anything as being done at the city of Washington, when all the mail they get is addressed to the city of Washington; when they maintain a post office in charge of the mail for the city of Washington; when everyone in the world, nearly, knows where the city of Washington is, except it may be legislators who are living in Washington, and the President, who just at present is absent from Washington, but cables to it every day.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that the law provides that clerks can not be detailed from the outside to serve here in the District of Columbia. In other words, it is necessary for the appropriation bill to specifically provide for the employment of these clerks "within the District of Columbia" in order to comply with the law.

Mr. MANN. I know that the appropriation laws for years had carried the language "in Washington, the District of Columbia," and nobody has ever had any trouble about the expenditure of that money. No payment has even been stopped on the ground that that did not correctly describe a locality, because it does correctly describe a locality. Everybody knows it except this distinguished Subcommittee on Appropriations.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I move to strike out the last word.

I understand the President does not date his proclamations from Washington City, but they are dated "The White House."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. "White House, District of Columbia."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. My understanding is that the house in which the President lives is commonly called the "White House." It was always officially designated as the "Executive Mansion" until President Roosevelt became President, and he then called it the "White House," and had stationery printed with "White House" on it, although there was no act of Congress calling it the "White House." Is that correct?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know of none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, there does not seem to be very much more law for calling it "White House" than there would be for "Washington City."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is correct in his statement that the law calls it "Executive Mansion."

Mr. MANN. There was no act of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Roosevelt said when he was President that he refused to call it the "Executive Mansion" because there are 48 other executive mansions in the United States, and therefore he called it "White House" and had it so put on his stationery. I am glad that official designation of it is accepted, even if it is not in the statute, and even if we do drop "Washington," although it is in the statute.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How long has the name Washington been dropped?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I did not know it had been dropped at all until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] mentioned the fact.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has been very recent, has it not?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not know. I refer the gentleman from Ohio to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. About a year ago, I remember, in a discussion on the floor of the House here the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] stated that he had taken up the matter with the President and informed him that there was no such thing in the law as the "city of Washington," but it was the "District of Columbia," and the President said he would use the words "White House, District of Columbia."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. There is just as much authority of law for saying "city of Washington" as there is for saying "The White House."

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know that the President has abolished many other institutions, but I did not know that he had abolished the city of Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Gentlemen, of course, may indulge in such pleasant criticism as they see fit, but the subcommittee was following the House, which, on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, in a number of instances, in the last legislative appropriation, where the words "city of Washington" occurred, struck out the words "city of Washington" and inserted "District of Columbia."

Mr. MANN. The law in many cases specifically names the city of Washington.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Perhaps not in all, but in a number of cases the gentleman from Kentucky moved to strike out "city of Washington" and insert "District of Columbia," and the House adopted the motion, so that the committee was simply following the instructions of the House, given at the last session.

Mr. MANN. I was not here. I did not know. I suppose there was nobody else in the Chamber when it was done, probably. [Laughter.] Certainly it is a disgrace to Congress to say that we can not refer to the city of Washington as the "city of Washington." We all know that it is here. The Post Office Department can tell you that, although they do not know much about location, unless you put on "District of Columbia" or the State. I think it is disgraceful for our country to say that in the lapse of years we have forgotten the name of George Washington. I know that we have forgotten a great many of his precepts, or discarded them, but, in addition, to forget his name, I think, is going too far.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Court of Customs Appeals: Presiding judge and 4 associate judges, at $7,000 each; marshal, $3,000; clerk, $3,500; assistant clerk, $2,000; 5 stenographic clerks, at $1,600 each; stenographic reporter, $2,500; messenger, $840; in all, $54,840.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it may be improper nowadays to use the designation "Washington" as the city where Members of Congress are to be addressed, but I received a letter this morning directed to me at Washington, and the trouble in it seems to be not that it is difficult to receive letters at Washington but that it is difficult to receive letters at Philadelphia. I ask that this letter be read in my time.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, January 14, 1919.

Congressman NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It was with interest I read the article in Saturday's issue of the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune with regard to the "mountains of undelivered mail for the soldiers," etc., and showing an effort on the part of the American postal authorities to fix the blame on the people "over there." But the question which I should like to see agitated is the fixing of the blame for the almost criminal inefficiency in the delivery of mail to sailors in our home ports. Let me state my case:

On July 2 my son, E. P. Romaine, was assigned to a ship, the U. S. S. Merauke, in Philadelphia Harbor. Some days later the ship was sent to New York to await convoy. There it lay until July 13 or 14, so I have since learned; then went overseas to St. Naziere; remained there a short time, probably 10 days or more, and returned to Philadelphia about the middle of September. From the day my son went on shipboard, July 2, although the ship lay in port many days, until he returned to Philadelphia in September not one letter of all those I wrote him reached him. On the last of September he again went abroad, returning on November 19. The conditions with regard to mail were as bad as before, nay worse. For upon returning to harbor he failed to receive a number of my letters, and those he did receive came dribbling in a few at a time in anything but the logical order, as No. 13, then 6, then 15, 7, 8, 14, 5, etc.

All of the above is bad enough, but the worst is what follows: On December 2 I mailed a Christmas box and package to my son. As a matter of fact, it takes 18 hours to go to Philadelphia from Cincinnati on the train. At the time of his sailing, December 6, he had not received either of those packages. Both packages had been insured. I wrote on December 10 to the postmaster at Philadelphia, inclosing 60 cents in stamps and asked him to please return the packages, as I did not want them to lie around the post office awaiting the return of the ship for two reasons: One was, the foodstuffs were perishable, and the other was that one package contained a watch which would be safer here than there. On December 12 Mr. John Thornton replied that he would investigate. I wrote again on December 18 asking that he at least return the 60 cents. I received a letter from him on December 20 stating that he had been unable to trace the packages and advising me to write to the Cincinnati post office, but not returning the aforesaid money. I had already written the full particulars to the Cincinnati postmaster on December 18, and up to date, January 14, I have received no answer.

I am a widow. I have cheerfully and gladly given two sons to the service of my country just at the time when they were getting able to provide for me. They were not dragged off to war, but enlisted. They went not from a spirit of adventure, but with a high and noble ideal of service in their hearts, and the gratitude of the Government they serve is manifested by such indifference and inefficiency as this.

Trusting that Congress may succeed in "fixing the blame," I am, my dear sir,

Most respectfully, CORA M. ROMAINE.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I submit that for the RECORD without comment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, and in reply ask the Clerk to read the letter which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. Does it require unanimous consent to have letters of this sort read at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It does to have them read by the Clerk.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask that it be read in my time.

Mr. BLACK. I make the point of order that it is out of order on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas objects to its being read by the Clerk.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Can I not read it in my own time?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I think the rule provides that no paper can be read at the Clerk's desk, except one that the House is called upon to vote on, when objection is made, unless the House requires it by a vote.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to change my objection to a reservation of objection and I will not press my objection at this time, but I want to make this statement: I do not think the reading of individual complaints of this kind during the discussion of a bill which has no relevancy to the subject accomplishes any useful purpose. Of course, instances of bad mail delivery to our soldiers and sailors are deeply to be regretted. We will all agree to that. My experience is that the Post Office Department is always ready and willing to investigate complaints of the kind that can properly be charged to its jurisdiction. The mail delivery of our soldiers in France has been under the control of the military authorities, and complaints along that line can be properly addressed to them. Members who do not agree to much of the criticism that is frequently voiced on the other side of the House could just as equitably take the time of the House in making a reply; at least could as well afford to do it from the standpoint of justice and fair play, and much of the time of the House would be spent in discussing matters extraneous to the bill under consideration. These instances are, of course, to be regretted, but I think there is a better way to reach whatever trouble there is. I do not object in this instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MOLINE, KANS., January 13, 1919.

Hon. P. P. CAMPBELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Believing that you have the interest of the people at heart, and especially the boys who fought and suffered in the great war, I am appealing to you in behalf of my son, Corpl. Glen R. Sawyer, Company I, One hundred and thirty-seventh Infantry, Thirty-fifth Division.

Shortly after war was declared on Germany, at the age of 20, he enlisted in the National Guard at Manhattan, where he was attending college. This company was afterwards drafted into Regular service and his company was thrown with the Wichita company and labeled Company I of the now famous One hundred and thirty-seventh, an all-Kansas regiment, which has been cited for their bravery and deeds of valor at the bloody and nerve-racking battle of the Argonne forest.

On the morning of September 29 my boy was wounded in his left foot by a machine-gun bullet and his right leg by a piece of shrapnel, and about an hour afterwards, while he was trying to crawl back to the first-aid station, he was gassed. After he was wounded and ordered one of his men to take his squad and lead them on he has never (up to December 15, when his last letter was written) seen a familiar face nor learned the fate of the rest of his comrades, nor had a single message from loved ones at home. To add to his misery, his lonesomeness, and the very pleasant thought that he will always be a cripple is the fact that he is also without money—has not been paid but once since last March, and most of that had been taken up by payments on liberty bonds and his insurance—and I know of no way that I can send him money, letter, or cable, and am appealing to you for help. One lady here paid $14 for a cable to her wounded boy in France, but he never received the message. The people throughout the country have given up all the money, all the food, and all the men the Government has asked for, and I know that any Kansas farmer has ingenuity enough about him, if he had plenty of men and money at his command, to perfect a system whereby wounded soldiers could get their mail with very little delay. My boy did not enter this war for money considerations, but for home, for country, and for our old flag, and if the Government will send him home we will be glad to relieve it from all responsibility and take care of our boy ourselves, but we don't want him to die in France because he feels that Government and friends alike have forsaken him. Our last letter from him was written December 15, at Base Hospital No. 119, at St. Nazaire, France, where he had been nearly a month waiting to be sent home, and if the President and his wife have not been shopping lately, nor if some of his colored servants haven't been saying some cute things, so that you can get a cablegram through, I want you to find out if my boy is still there; and if he is, get him word that all is well at home and cable him some money; also wire Miss Harriet E. Stanley, No. 257 West Seventy-third Street, New York, if he has arrived there yet, as she is watching for him, and he has had plenty of time to arrive since his last letter.

Now, Mr. CAMPBELL, I know that you haven't the time to bother with this yourself, but for the love of humanity have some one to look after this under your direction and draw on me for all expenses through the Moline National Bank. I am not rich, neither am I what you would call well to do, but, if necessary, I will give a thousand dollars to relieve my boy's mind. He says that he feels just like Robinson Crusoe did when cast on an uninhabited island with no knowledge of what became of friends and home. My boy has given up his education, home, love, and money for his country. He has never complained, found fault, or written a single discouraging or blue letter home, but that shows the kind of stuff the Thirty-fifth Division is composed of.

Thanking you from the bottom of my heart and assuring you that I will do my very best to repay you in the future for any and all your efforts for my boy, I am,

Yours, truly,

E. E. SAWYER.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I could get no information whatever from the War Department. I then went to the Red Cross, and this morning through their assistance have cabled this young man $60 and the news that his parents were still thinking of him. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the pay of telephone-switchboard operators, assistant messengers, firemen, watchmen, laborers, and charwomen provided for in this act, except those employed in mints and assay offices, unless otherwise specially stated, shall be as follows: For telephone-switchboard operators, assistant messengers, firemen, and watchmen, at the rate of $720 per annum each; for laborers, at the rate of $660 per annum each; assistant telephone-switchboard operators, at the rate of $600 each, and for charwomen, at the rate of $240 per annum each.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] if the $120 increase proposed in this bill will apply to those employees mentioned in section 2 which has just been read?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Does it include the charwomen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They get the increase up to 30 per cent of the salary which they receive.

Mr. DYER. The telephone operators and others will get the full amount?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They will get the full amount.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That all civilian employees of the Governments of the United States and the District of Columbia who receive a total of compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum or less, except as otherwise provided in this section shall receive, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, additional compensation at the rate of $120 per annum: Provided, That such employees as receive a total of annual compensation at a rate more than $2,500 and less than $2,620 shall receive additional compensation at such rate per annum as may be necessary to make their salaries, plus their additional compensation, at the rate of $2,620 per annum, and no employee shall receive additional compensation under this section at a rate which is more than 30 per cent of the rate of the total annual compensation received by such employee: Provided further, That the increased compensation at the rate of $120 per annum for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, shall not be computed as salary in construing this section: Provided further, That where an employee in the service on June 30, 1918, has received during the fiscal year 1919, or shall receive during the fiscal year 1920 an increase of salary at a rate in excess of $200 per annum, or where an employee whether previously in the service or not has entered the service since June 30, 1918, whether such employee has received an increase in salary or not, such employees shall be granted the increased compensation provided herein only when and upon the certification of the person in the legislative branch or the head of the department or establishment employing such persons of the ability and qualifications personal to such employees as would justify such increased compensation: Provided further, That the increased compensation provided in this section to employees whose pay is adjusted from time to time through wage boards or similar authority shall be taken into consideration by such wage boards or similar authority in adjusting the pay of such employees.

The provisions of this section shall not apply to the following: Employees paid from the postal revenues and sums which may be advanced from the Treasury to meet deficiencies in the postal revenues; employees of the Panama Canal on the Canal Zone; employees of the Alaskan Engineering Commission in Alaska; employees paid from lump-sum appropriations in bureaus, divisions, commissions, or any other governmental agencies or employments created by law since January 1, 1916; employees whose duties require only a portion of their time, except charwomen, who shall be included; employees whose services are utilized for brief periods at intervals; persons employed by or through corporations, firms, or individuals acting for or on behalf of or as agents of the United States or any department or independent establishment of the Government of the United States in connection with construction work or the operation of plants; employees who receive a part of their pay from any outside sources under cooperative arrangements with the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia; employees who serve voluntarily or receive only a nominal compensation, and employees who may be provided with special allowances because of their service in foreign countries. The provisions of this section shall not apply to employees of the railroads taken over by the United States, and nothing contained herein shall be deemed a recognition of the employees of such railroads as employees of the United States.

Section 6 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved May 10, 1916, as amended by the naval appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, shall not operate to prevent anyone from receiving the additional compensation provided in this section who otherwise is entitled to receive the same.

Such employees as are engaged on piecework, by the hour, or at per diem rates, if otherwise entitled to receive the additional compensation shall receive the same at the rate to which they are entitled in this section when their fixed rate of pay for the regular working hours and on the basis of 313 days in the said fiscal year would amount to $2,500 or less: Provided, That this method of computation shall not apply to any per diem employees regularly paid a per diem for every day in the year.

So much as may be necessary to pay the additional compensation provided in this section to employees of the Government of the United States is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

So much as may be necessary to pay the increased compensation provided in this section to employees of the government of the District of Columbia is appropriated, one-half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, except to employees of the Washington Aqueduct and the water department, which shall be paid entirely from the revenues of the water department.

So much as may be necessary to pay the increased compensation provided in this section to persons employed under trust funds who may be construed to be employees of the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia is authorized to be paid, respectively, from such trust funds.

Reports shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session showing for the first four months of the fiscal year the average number of employees in each department, bureau, office, or establishment receiving the increased compensation at the rate of $120 per annum and the average number by grades receiving the same at each other rate.

During the reading of the foregoing—

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As we are now reading section 6, I ask if amendments should not be withheld until we complete the section?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a general appropriation bill, and is being read by paragraphs.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I ask unanimous consent that the entire section be read, and that it be then in order to offer amendments or to make any points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the paragraph may be read, after which amendments or points of order may be made to any part of the section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the foregoing.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, on page 146, line 18, I move to strike out "$120" and insert "$360."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEATING: Page 146, line 18, strike out "$120" and insert "$360."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen have expressed a desire to speak on this amendment. I am wondering if it would not save time to make some sort of an arrangement now.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was just going to ask the gentleman from Colorado if we could not agree upon, say, 30 minutes' discussion?

Mr. MASON. I would like 10 minutes, and I would not want to agree to any time which would not give me that opportunity.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman can get his time under an agreement. It seems to me it would be more in line with what the Members generally desire if we could come to some agreement now, limiting the debate, and I hope we can agree upon some reasonable time.

Mr. KEATING. Say half an hour for our side of the proposition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It seems to me we ought to close this debate in less than an hour. I would suggest to the gentleman 20 minutes on a side. I do not know how many desire to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to have five minutes in opposition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the time ought to be equally divided between those who are for and those who are against the amendment.

Mr. MASON. I do not want to consent to any agreement unless I can have 10 minutes.

Mr. DYER. Unless there is some agreement arrived at, any Member can move to close the debate after 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not submit it as a part of the request that my colleague [Mr. MASON] shall have 10 minutes?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think this is practically the only remaining contested portion of the bill, and the gentleman from Colorado has suggested that 30 minutes will be sufficient for those who favor his amendment. I therefore ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in one hour, the time to be allotted by the Chair evenly between those who are for and those who are against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] desires 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not object to that.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that out of the hour the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] be given 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. On which side?

Mr. MASON. I am in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in one hour, one-half the time to be given to those who are in favor of the pending amendment and one-half the time to those who are opposed, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] have 10 minutes of that time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the debate to be confined to the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can get the Chair to put his name down.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know whether my name is on the list or not, but I hope it is.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I should like to have the Chair put my name down for five minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. I should like to be recognized for five minutes in favor of the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Let us have the request submitted, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Can not gentlemen indicate to the Chair who is to have the time? The Chair thinks an hour will cover all the allowances, but he is not sure.

Mr. AUSTIN. Reserving the right to object, I suggest that we make it an hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee which has been stated by the Chair?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is entitled to recognition.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak of the particular locality where I live and the amount of money that is paid to Federal employees there. The pay of the charwomen and the laborers, the elevator men and watchmen in the Federal building in the city of Chicago is so low as to amount to an absolute disgrace to the Government of the United States. Case after case of charity is found among the people who are employed by the United States Government. The assistant custodian of the building has been obliged to advertise, and to do it at his own expense, for help, so many of the employees have left. Sometimes 15 or 20 people reply, but none will take the employment. The charwomen are getting as low as about $27 a month. Let me call your attention to one case, that of Estelle Austin, who died in an infirmary from tuberculosis one year ago. One of the internes called at the custodian's office afterwards and informed the assistant that the woman contracted the disease because of not receiving proper nourishment, stating that it was a crime to have anyone work for the wages the Government was paying. She had herself and her father to support. Her pay I think was about $27 a month.

I have here before me a petition, which with the permission of the committee I shall insert at this point in my remarks:

To the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned, desire to call the attention of your honorable body to the condition of salaries in the custodian service of the Federal Building, Chicago.

Elevator men are receiving only a paltry $60 per month, and as a result most of the former reliable force has left and now the personnel is constantly changing, a dangerous and annoying condition. For $60 a month watchmen guarding the building are expected to work seven days a week and buy their uniforms. The laborers and charwomen are in a similar, deplorable condition.

There is now a resolution before the House to grant an increase of $1 per day to these employees pending the reorganization of the Federal service, and it is our earnest plea that such increase be given, in order to meet in part the very great increase in the cost of necessities, and that Federal employees may enjoy at least a "living wage."

Respectfully submitted.

Kenesaw M. Landis, Arthur L. Sanborn, Geo. A. Carpenter, judges of the district court; Peter Newton, secretary Civil Service Commission; Chas. Schirmer, examiner Railway Mail Service; J. E. Mansfield, examiner Railway Mail Service; Ed. M. Hodgetts, inspector railway mail cars; C. H. Otis, chief examiner Railway Mail Service; Thomas I. Porter, chief United States Secret Service; Read Hanna, chief pension examiner; Frank Shoenfield, chief clerk Railway Mail Service; Benj. F. Carle, chief clerk Railway Mail Service; W. H. Wagner, chief examiner naturalization service; Frederick W. Weber, assistant chief examiner naturalization service; Jno. M. Hubbard, jr., superintendent money-order division (post office); Julius A. Smitanka, collector internal revenue; Walter Greenwood, boiler inspector; Peter Larson, boiler inspector; William Nicholas, chief boiler inspector; Paul Hermes, Treasury agent; Henry J. Cox, weather forecaster; Lewis F. Maser, United States commissioner; Joseph F. Ryan, chief deputy marshal; Charles L. Mitchell, assistant weather forecaster; Arthur E. Whitty, assistant United States attorney; John B. Boddie, assistant United States attorney; Charles F. Clyne, United States attorney; Joseph D. Flemming, United States attorney.

Think of a man having to support a family, buying his own uniform, trying to educate a family on $60 a month! The condition of that building is simply a disgrace to the Government of the United States because of niggardly, miserable salaries that are being paid there. A comparison with the pay for the same sort of labor in the City Hall in Chicago would show a very great difference in the wages paid by the city and those paid by the Government. I do not want to encumber the RECORD by inserting all of the letters which I hold in my hand, but my colleagues can see what a number I have. They are letters of men who have resigned from the work simply because they could not live upon the wages paid. To be an employee of the Government of the United States should add some dignity to the employment; but just think of the conditions, when in some cases they are dependent upon the county agents to eke out a living, while doing service for the Government of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed five minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hands 150 letters addressed to Rivers McNeill, custodian, most of them resigning their positions, each one giving as a reason that they could not live on their pay, some of them saying they declined the appointment, and in every case do so on account of poor pay. I insert here rates paid by the custodian of the City Hall, Chicago, and a resolution showing pay of some work in Government building:

Rates of pay prevailing in the custodian service of the city hall, Chicago, Ill.

Designation.	Compensation per month.	Number of hours worked.	Remarks.
Charwomen	$80.00	5½	No Sunday work.
Laborers or janitors:
First year	80.00	7	Do.
After 2 years	85.00	7	Do.
Window washers	90.00	8	Do.
Elevator conductors	100.00	8	And are furnished 2 suits and 2 shirts every year.
Elevator starters	125.00	8	Also furnished suits.
Coal passers	105.60
Firemen	120.00
Assistant engineers, 2d class	150.00

Whereas Delegates Charles F. Nagl, Luther C. Steward, and E. J. Newmyer, of the National Federation of Federal Employees, have introduced resolution No. 87 at the convention of the American Federation of Labor held at St. Paul, Minn.; and

Whereas said resolution was prompted by the extremely poor wages now being paid to employees in the Custodian Service in the 1,200 Federal buildings all over the country as shown by the following table:

	Per month.
Charwomen	$27.08
Laborers	55.00
Window washers	55.00
Elevator conductors	60.00
Marble cleaners	60.00
Watchmen	60.00
Cabinetmakers	65.00
Oilers	70.00
Stenographers	75.00
Engineer helpers	83.33
Foremen	83.33

Plus a monthly increase of $8.12 to charwomen and $10 to all other employees granted by Congress for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1918, and ending June 30, 1919; and

Whereas readjustments in wages have been made in practically every other department in the Government service except in the Custodian Service, where no heed is given to the appeal of those employees for some aid to meet the ever-increasing high cost of living; and

Whereas this discrimination results in inconsistencies in the rates of pay for employees in the Government service doing the same kind of work and working side by side, and fosters dissatisfaction and inefficiency on the part of the lower-paid employees; for instance, laborers in the post office receive $1,038 per annum, while the compensation for laborers in the Custodian Service, whose work is harder and more hazardous, is only $780 per annum; and

Whereas said resolution No. 87 was referred to the committee on executive council's report, who concurred in the cause prompting that resolution and approved the object desired and recommended that the executive council of the American Federation of Labor use all methods and means deemed advisable by them to accomplish that purpose, and this report by the committee was adopted; and

Whereas in view of the lack of results and no report of their actions being submitted by the said executive council, it seems that no action was yet taken by them to obtain relief for the underpaid employees in the Custodian Service of the United States, who find it harder every day to support their families decently and to provide for them comforts necessary to life on the meager wages now being paid to them.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, for 10 years I have been an advocate in this House for readjustment, reclassification, and equalization of salaries. I had hoped to see the time come before my departure when these inequalities which have stood for half a century or more would be removed. In the last appropriation bill an increase of $10 a month was added. The Committee on Appropriation's proposition now is to continue for another year the $120 and create a commission to study the question and report legislation to the next Congress. I know that the membership of the House has an open mind upon this question. All seek and desire to do right and justice, not only to the Government but to every employee from the humblest to the highest. In no section of the Republic are living conditions more trying or more expensive than they are in the city of Washington. We require and expect of the Government officials that they will be a credit, not only to themselves but to the great Government they are serving so well and so faithfully.

In the daily Times of this city two days ago appeared an editorial carrying a letter from a mother whose husband is an employee of this Government. I desire to have the Clerk read that letter in my time. It is an appeal which ought to reach the heart and conscience of every man who sits on the floor of this House. All that I ask of my colleagues in the consideration of this proposition and in casting this vote is to place themselves in the position of the Government employee in the city of Washington. This is an appeal from those who render the highest possible clerical service in all this country. Every one of us is a daily witness to the creditable and efficient manner in which the public business is transacted. It is done so thoroughly, so efficiently, it is certainly worthy of the most careful consideration when we are to pass upon a just and fair compensation for those who perform it.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the letter carried in the editorial which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

I am the wife of a Federal employee who receives the large sum of $720 per annum, and also the mother of seven dependent children.

I would like to rear my children to be honest and respectable citizens, but how in the name of God can I do it with such starvation wages? As a rule, the poor man has a large family, and it is the poor man that contributes the majority of soldiers and sailors to his country. Uncle Sam expects his soldiers to be strong and brave, but I would like to ask some of those Congressmen how they expect the future soldiers and sailors to be strong and brave when in their infancy they are underfed and deprived of the necessities of life.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I expect to support the recommendation of the committee, as it is already written in this bill to grant salary increases of $120 to all of those Government employees who receive $2,500 or less, except certain enumerated exceptions which have been provided for in other bills, such as postal employees. I think my record of votes in the House on these propositions of salary increase is reasonably consistent. Wherever I have thought the increases proposed were reasonable and justified by the services to be performed, I have supported them. Wherever I have thought the increases were unreasonable and not justified, I have voted against them. At the present session I voted against the proposition to increase the salaries of the Federal judges. I did not do so because of any lack of respect for the Federal judiciary, nor because of any undervaluing of their work, but I voted against the proposed increases because I believed the salary which they now receive is a good one and is ample to support themselves and their families in comfort. And I want to pause right here long enough to speak about a matter of criticism which I have recently observed in the press and elsewhere with reference to the salary of $12,000 paid to our Cabinet officers. Most of the printed discussion which I have seen in the papers was in advocacy of increasing the amount.

I do not agree to that proposition. I think that one of the things most needed in the United States to-day among our rich and well to do is to get back to the old-fashioned simplicity of living which used to be the rule to a much greater extent than it is to-day. I do not know of anything in our modern life which I think is more productive of much of the discontent which exists in the world to-day than the luxury and extravagance which has grown up in the mode of living among some of our rich and well to do. We need to get back to the simple life. The United States, least of all nations in the world, can afford to tolerate caste or class distinction, and I know of nothing that will remove it more quickly and more effectually than simple and modest standards of living among all classes of our people. I merely say this in passing with reference to a condition which may well arrest our thoughtful attention.

Now, back to the question of this salary-increase proposition. It is one of the laws of economics that in a period of war inflation that prices of commodities rise much more rapidly than do wages and salaries, and when that period of war inflation has passed the reverse is true and the prices of commodities fall more rapidly than wages and salaries. Of course, there are some exceptions, but this is undoubtedly the rule. It is well that it should be so, because it is one of nature's evening-up processes of adjusting the equities between the different classes of workers. Now, every sensible man knows that we have been passing through a period of unprecedented war inflation. The prices of commodities have risen rapidly and many of them to very high figures. But it is also undoubtedly true that the period of war inflation has reached its crest, and that there will be a fall in the prices of commodities, and this fall will increase the purchasing power of the dollar and thereby increase the value of the wage. This will within itself amount to an increase in wages in so far as its effect is concerned. Therefore, in view of the facts, present and prospective, and in view of the need for at least a reasonable amount of economy in Government expenditures, I will support the recommendation of the committee to increase these salaries $120 per annum rather than the amendment now proposed to make the increase $360 per annum.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. LAZARO. In view of the fact that so much territory that was devoted to production has been converted into——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. My time has expired, and I regret that I will be unable to answer the question which the gentleman was about to propound.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Idaho [Mr. SMITH], if he were here, would be in favor of this amendment. Unfortunately he has been sick for the last two days, and he asked me to have incorporated in the RECORD a letter received from the president of the United States Civil Service Commission and some statistics which he received from the Housing and Health Division of the War Department regarding the appointments and separations from the civil service from the month of March, 1918, to the month of December, inclusive, showing a total of 75,588 appointments and 40,718 separations. Out of the 75,588 employees who came here, 40,718 were dissatisfied and returned to their homes, or approximately that number, figuring those who had been here prior to March of last year, who had separated themselves also. I desire to have that incorporated in the RECORD along with the letter to Mr. SMITH, who would have supported this amendment.

The letter and statement referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1919.

Hon. ADDISON T. SMITH,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: I inclose herewith a statement showing by months the number of appointments to and separations from the Government service in Washington from March to December, 1918, inclusive. This information was prepared by the Housing and Health Division of the War Department from reports of the several departments and independent establishments. The information was not prepared for the earlier months of the year.

There has been much discussion of the inadequacy of salaries paid by the Government, but dissatisfaction with pay received is only one of a number of reasons for resignation from the Government service.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. MCILHENNY, President.

Statement of appointments to and separations from the Government service, by months, from March to December, 1918, inclusive, prepared by the Housing and Health Division of the War Department.

Month.	Appointments.	Separations.	Increase.	Decrease.
March	6,567	2,450	4,117
April	7,529	3,046	4,483
May	6,272	3,251	3,021
June	8,233	3,908	4,325
July	8,736	3,099	5,637
August	8,075	3,736	4,339
September	10,943	5,291	5,652
October	10,432	6,189	4,243
November	5,525	4,755	770
December	3,276	4,993		1,717

Mr. NOLAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Congress to the way we have been treating the employees under our care compared with the way that the employees of the Government under the care and jurisdiction of the various boards created by Congress who have jurisdiction over wages and salaries are treated. The Railroad Wage Board, the Wage Adjustment Board, and the War Labor Board have been active in taking up the question of wages of the employees of the Government of the United States and those employed by contractors on contracts with the Government of the United States, and in many instances the War Labor Board has adjudicated disputes between the employer and the employee in private industry. Now, take the case of the Railroad Wage Board. The Railroad Wage Board gave exhaustive study to the condition of the railroad wages of this country and gave an increase to every man in the employ of the railroads of this country receiving $3,000 a year and less, giving the largest increase to the poorest-paid employee. The Wage Adjustment Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, adjusted wages, and in this instance and in the case of the War Labor Board they based their findings upon the increased cost of living. Now look at the difference between the boards, the institutions created by Congress to deal with employees, and Congress itself. You give a flat increase of $10 per month to both the lowest-paid employee and those receiving salaries up to and including $2,500 per annum.

This committee has given no consideration whatever to the actual increase in cost of living of Government employees, whereas the increases allowed by the Wage Adjustment Board, the Railroad Wage Board, and the War Labor Board have been based on increased prices. This is the only fair way to treat this wage and salary question, and if we were as just as our wage boards and commissioners we would be paying a great deal more money to the Government workers than the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado provides for.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish the members of the committee would stop and consider one minute what this amendment means. This bill carries in round figures about $90,000,000. This amendment will add in the neighborhood of $40,000,000 to this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What?

Mr. SISSON. About $40,000,000, making the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill about $136,000,000 instead of $90,000,000. Now, the next session you gentleman are going to have control of the House. This is a most radical increase in salaries. The purpose of the committee a year ago in putting the $120 increase into the bill was for the purpose of taking care of the physical increase in the cost of food.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I have only four minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I only wanted to know if the gentleman referred to the $120 amendment or the $360 amendment.

Mr. SISSON. The $360 amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that carried $40,000,000 increase?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; more than the present bill. Now, there is objection made to the fact that everybody gets the $120 increase, but the percentage of the increase on the lower-paid salaries is very much greater than on the higher-paid salaries. Now, it is a most difficult matter to adjust salaries. If you were to undertake to adjust salaries in all the departments of the Government you have got a man's job for at least a year; and the great difficulty in adjusting salaries is, first, to determine the character of the work done by the employee, and even then you ought to know something about the efficiency of the employee. We have no proper efficiency system in this Government. Now, this $120 is a gratuity.

I am going to call your attention to one fact: This bill will carry $360 increase for the teachers of the District of Columbia, and yet the basic salary of the teachers' pay in the bill that just passed the House is higher—the basic salary of the teachers in the graded school—than in any other city in the United States; and, when you add to it the longevity pay, they are the best paid school-teachers in the United States, irrespective of whether you complain about low-paid or high-paid teachers. I have now in my office reports on 20 or 30 cities and from the State superintendents in which they give the basic salary. The city of Philadelphia, in the high-school grades, pays a little better salary than the District of Columbia. In the city of Chicago, in the higher grades, they pay a little better salary than in the District of Columbia; but in what is the graded-school districts the higher salary, irrespective of the regular longevity increase, is paid in the District of Columbia; and if you take the employees in the District of Columbia and compare them with like employees of all the city governments in the United States the average pay and the base pay are higher for like work than in any city in the United States. You may take the clerk hire here and the clerk hire in the city of New York, and in the city of Philadelphia, and in the city of Chicago, and for like work we are paying a higher wage in the District of Columbia now than they pay there; and this committee, in view of the fact that there was a congested condition of population here, in view of the fact that there was a condition here which did not prevail in other cities, notwithstanding the fact that they were getting a higher average pay than other cities, added $120, which would cost some $17,000,000 for the employees of this Government. Gentlemen, you had best think before you thoughtlessly adopt the $360. I hope you will vote it down.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, before it is decided that what the gentleman says is a fact I think it would be well to look up a few of the statistics regarding not only the pay of teachers but the pay of Government employees everywhere——

Mr. SISSON. I have.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Of Government employees particularly. Now, we were very charitably disposed in the early part of this week, and we voted $100,000,000 to take care of the poor in the Old World, and I was in favor of it. Now, I am one of those who believe that charity should begin at home just the same, and if it is anywhere necessary to do charity I think it is among the poorly paid Government employees of the United States, regardless of what they get or what you propose to give them.

My colleague from Illinois [Mr. MASON] referred to a condition in Chicago. How can a man in a big city who has a family and gets only $60 a month live upon that amount and support his family? And I would like to know by what kind of reasoning they can be said to be getting good pay. Now, I have a copy of the petition that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] called your attention to, and I wish to say that they are having the most difficult time to retain people in the Government service in order to do the work that is necessary in the Federal Building at Chicago. It is one of the greatest Government buildings in the country—not the kind of a building that it ought to be; it is a makeshift. The conditions in that building under which these people work are simply deplorable. Now, I am in favor of being half decent, at least, with the employees of the Government. We passed a bill here the other day for $27,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors—rivers where there is no commerce at all. I did not hear any very great amount of opposition to that bill. That is a waste of money. But whenever there is a proposition here to raise the pay of an employee I have noticed ever since I have been a Member of Congress, when we want to raise wages, there are always people anxious for the time to oppose any such proposition. I hope the amendment will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, Governments, as a rule, rarely pay high salaries, and ought not to do so. The pay is certain. There is no danger of bankruptcy. But while the Government ought not to pay high salaries, a Government which can exist at all ought to be able to do justice to its employees, to the men who work for it. We have been lavish in expenditures of money in many directions, frequently when I was in opposition to the proposition. Can we now afford not to increase the salary, but to refuse to do justice, to the employees of the Government? Everywhere throughout the land in private employment men and women have received an advance in pay much more in proportion than is proposed by the pending amendment—a demand that came and a demand that was conceded because of the great increase in the cost of actual living. It would not perhaps be the best time now to fix permanent salaries of Government employees, because we all hope that the cost of living will be reduced, though I do not apprehend that it will go back to where it was before the war in years to come, if it ever does. We can afford, inasmuch as we are a great Government, to pay living wages to the men and women who work for the Government. We can not afford to pay starving wages to them. It is not right to ask it. It is not right to expect it. It is no answer to say that these men can leave the employ of the Government. The question is, Can the Government itself afford to be just in its dealings with those who work for it? I think the Government can afford to be just, as I think private employers are forced and compelled by circumstances to be just. These people will not lay up great supplies of money even with the increase that is proposed here. But they ought to receive pay enough to give them decent living, allow them to have children, and provide some education for their children. I think we can afford to be economical in many directions, but not by starvation wages to those who work for and really maintain the work of the Government itself. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] said the thing to do was to go back to the simple life. I dare say, the Government employees that are receiving $60 or $75 a month would like to see the gentleman from Texas or some one else with mighty power wave his magic wand and bring them back to the simple life. Bring them back to the days——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have only two minutes. I wish I could yield, but I can not. Take the things that the poor man has to buy—the man who is working for the Government at $60 or $75 a month—to keep his soul and body together and to keep the soul and body of his family together. He has to pay 85 cents a dozen for eggs. All character of vegetables have increased in price from 200 to 400 per cent. Take the case of a family such as that spoken of by the gentleman from Tennessee, consisting of a wife with seven little children, where the wife can not get enough for one day's wage of her husband to enable her to give to each of her children a bite of meat.

That is the condition that is confronting us now, a condition not brought about by these men and women working for these wages, which would seem ample in ordinary times when we were back in the simple life. Yet we see this spectacle to-day in the case of people working on salary, clerks and people under Government employ, who are the poorest paid people in all the United States. The average section hand on a railroad to-day is getting $90 a month. A car knocker, whose business it is to sound the wheels when the train rolls into the station to see whether the wheels are safe or not, gets $150 a month. The average jack-leg carpenter gets $8 a day. Your Government clerks get only $60 a month—the same as they got before we entered into this war and before the present high prices of commodities obtained. Something must be done in common justice, in common humanity, to relieve this situation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I have remaining of my time five minutes. I yield one-half of that to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time allotted for the debate be extended 30 minutes, one-half for and one-half against.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I was very much interested in this amendment, yet I had to keep my time down to three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] is recognized for two minutes and a half.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment there is justification for this increase from $120 to $360 which has been asked for. I have in mind an increase that has taken place in a manufactory which manufactured during the war period a semiessential. The average wage rate in that factory, including men, women, and children, during April, 1917, was $17.71 per week, some getting more and some less, or $930.92 per annum, whereas in December last, December 28 of last year, 1918, the average weekly rate for every man, woman, and child was $27.61, or $1,425.72, or an average increase per annum of $494.80.

This proposed increase here, in my judgment, is not more than any employee of the Government should have had to compensate for the difference between the high cost of living at this time and the cost of living previous to the war.

Of course, I am in hope, as every one else is, that during the period that we are now legislating for the necessities will decrease in cost to some extent, and while I shall support the $360 proposition, yet, in view of the great possibility, in my judgment, of a decrease in the cost of living during the period that we are legislating for, I would prefer to vote for an amendment that would provide for an increase of $240 instead of $360.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is no question but that there are some inequalities in the pay of some of our Government employees, but a survey had a year ago as to the comparative salaries of those in civil employment with those in public employment, so far as the clerical force was concerned, showed that, notwithstanding the shortage of labor and the mounting prices in civil employment, which were at the peak, yet the Government salaries were greater than those paid in private employment. Yet on top of that the committee came in here and recommended an appropriation of $120. Now it is sought, because of this organized effort on the part of Federal employees throughout the country, to raise that to $360.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has at his disposal in this bill $21,000,000 for the collection of internal revenue. In the last year, under the authority vested in him, he has revised the pay of all those officials, ranging from $1,400 up to $2,500 and above. You plan to give the stenographers in the District here, who are receiving $1,200 or $1,400, more than is being paid in private employment, where they are obliged to work with greater intensity and where they are not allowed 30 days' leave, an increase of salary of $360, amounting to a total drain on the Treasury of $28,000,000.

Oh, it is easy enough to come and ask for this great increase, but if you vote it you will never withdraw from it, because it will be there always to haunt you.

Now, we are providing for a commission here to equalize salaries. For years in the Committee on Appropriations I have been seeking to raise the salaries of the lower-paid officials, those receiving $720 and $840, but my efforts have been unavailing. This year the effort failed by a tie vote. I want to see those salaries raised, but I protest against the unfair method that is being adopted by the organized employees of the country in trying to raid the Treasury now by asking for a higher allowance, when it is admitted that the cost of living will go down. No one who has studied this question can deny but that the Government is a better employer than private employers. No one can deny that in these clerical positions we pay more than private employers.

Oh, true, we pay the charwomen $240 or $320 for two hours' work a day. They have other employment. True, we voted to the postal employees $200 increase. Those employees are persons employed out in the field, who are, in most cases, married; but the great majority of the employees provided for in this bill are single persons, receiving on an average $1,200 a year, and now you propose in one fell swoop to raid the Treasury to the extent of $28,000,000 just because they have become organized. If we are going into Government ownership of railroads and other public utilities, let us here and now establish the record that we will not be stampeded by raids on the Treasury by organizations of Federal employees merely writing to us and asking increased salaries when they are being paid more than private employees, and who are only too glad to retain their Government positions because they are easier and better paid than those in private employment. They do not resign from the Government service, and there is no better proof of the fact that their salaries are better than those in private employment, when there were plenty of opportunities for employment under private employment, than the fact that they did not resign.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes and a half.

Mr. MASON. I want to say to the gentleman that he is mistaken and that these Government employees do resign, and that I hold in my hand here a pile of letters written by men working for $60 a month who left those places to get $5 and $6 a day. They do resign; and their resignations impair not only the credit and good standing of your Government, but they impair the service; they impair the sanitation; they impair the care of the public buildings of this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Is there an official who states that they impair the Government efficiency? Can the gentleman cite one instance where any Government official makes that charge?

Mr. MASON. I can if you will give me the time; I can not in a minute and a half. But I say that in the city of Chicago the Federal building there is not being properly cared for. I do not intend to burden the RECORD with all these letters of resignation, but I ask leave to make a synopsis of them. It is not true that for the same service the Government is paying as much as private employers in the city of Chicago. Elevator men there in private employment are getting from 50 to 75 and 100 per cent more than they are getting from the Government of the United States and they do resign, and in a way that throws discredit upon the Government of the United States. I understood that the charwomen worked more than two hours a day for $27 a month; but in the great city of Chicago they have got to pay their car fare, they have got to go at a particular time to do that work, and it is a fact that we are impairing the service and discrediting the good name of the Government of the United States.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCE LETTERS, CUSTODIAN SERVICE.

[Extracts.]

"I am employed at a salary of $55 per month. I have a wife and two children dependent upon me for support and am compelled to deprive myself and family of all amusements or recreation. My wife is compelled to work in order to make both ends meet."

"I have a wife, three children, and a mother to support. I have to work after office hours, because $60 per month is not enough to keep my family in health. When I think of what we passed through last winter, I could wish that God would take my children out of their suffering rather than stand by helpless."

"The salary which I am receiving as charwoman does not bear my expenses, and therefore I am compelled to do other work to support myself and three children."

"I am employed at a salary of $660 per annum. I am compelled to seek work on the outside in order to make both ends meet. Amusements are out of the question. Should I become ill I do not know what would become of my family, because it is absolutely impossible for me to lay aside one cent for any contingency."

"I am employed at a salary of $60.60 per month and have to do outside work in order to meet my expenses, and they are getting worse. And my wife has to work in order that she may help clothe herself and our child."

"I am a single man endeavoring to take care of my parents, who are becoming feeble with age, and I am unable to live off my present salary of $60 per month. I am, therefore, forced to seek evening employment, which prevents me from taking rest after the completion of one job."

"I only get $60.50 a month and have five in the family. My wife has to do laundry work to help when she is able, and after putting in a day's work at the post office I have to hunt other work in order to get by."

"My small salary of $840 per annum is not sufficient to support my family. In order to make both ends meet, I have been compelled to work from 4.30 a. m. to 8.30 p. m. I am compelled to live in the country at a disadvantage in order to cultivate a few acres of land and raise some chickens. This all means hardship, and even using these means it is a struggle to live. I never know what a day's pleasure or holiday is, for it is work all the time to meet the necessities of life."

"During the last three years I have rented a small farm and begin the day at 4.30 and work until about 7 a. m. and then leave my home for the city, and on returning home in the evening I begin again and work until about 9 o'clock and sometimes 10 o'clock at night, and take all of my 14 days' holiday to work on the farm."

"Employed as messenger at $840 per annum. I have a wife and five little children, and find the compensation inadequate for the support of my family, even with the utmost economy, and am obliged to seek work at night. Our compensation has not been increased for many years."

"My salary as charwoman is $25 a month. I have to seek employment outside in order to take care of myself and blind daughter."

(Another employee in the same service writes that his salary being insufficient to support himself and his wife and children, he is obliged to gather rags after office hours when he should be resting.)

"I am employed in the United States public stores, and have not only been forced to do outside work at night in order to live but I have been compelled to take my 15-year-old boy out of school in an effort to keep up, and then I am unable to do so on my present salary of $70 per month, with a bonus of $10 for this year only. I have a wife and three children under 16 years of age, and in keeping with American citizenship it is necessary that I keep my children looking decent and respectable, have a comfortable home, keep them comfortably clad during the winter, and give them an education, if for no other purpose than becoming good American citizens, that they may not of necessity become a burden on us or our country. Could you do this with the above salary? Furthermore, I was compelled to utilize the 14 days given me this year as annual leave to work in a packing house at $4 per day. Is it possible that an individual who works for the United States Government has to go outside to take extra work because of the inadequate salary paid by the Government, and also keep his children out of school (which in itself is a disgrace to the Government) in order to earn the necessaries of life?

"Gentlemen, can you tell me how the standard of American citizenship can be attained at the present cost of commodities on a wage of $70 per month? And how I am to call in a doctor in case of necessity at $3 or $5 a visit?"

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the privilege of casting my vote for such a just and righteous measure as this is. I know from my own experience as a former employee of the executive branch of the Government what conditions in the departments have been and what they are to-day. I would gladly vote to make the increase even larger than this amendment proposes in——

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; I can not, as I only have a moment or two.

Mr. GORDON. How much does he think this increase ought to be, if it is too small?

Mr. LANGLEY. I had not finished the sentence. What I had in mind to say was that I would vote even for a larger increase than is proposed in the cases of persons who are in the lower salary grades. There is where the privation really exists. I wish I had time, Mr. Chairman, to state my views more elaborately on these matters to the committee, but since I have not I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I think it is well not to be swept off our feet touching certain conditions that may need pronounced remedying, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] has referred, and in order to deal with such a situation we ought not to deal with a great many others that do not present anything like the equities that may exist in regard to the cases he speaks of. Now, if you want to increase the compensation of the employees of public buildings over the country the place to do that is in the sundry civil bill when you get to the item that makes provision for the care and maintenance of those buildings; but a desire to deal with that situation is no reason why you should now vote to increase the pay of a great many clerical people who are getting more money than is being paid for the same sort of work out in civil life; and it is not wise for us here to be swept off our feet at the expense of the Treasury to the extent of something like $30,000,000 or more by these special pleas. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the Members of the House will not be swept off their feet either by the arguments for or against this amendment. They will not be swept off their feet by the charge that these Government positions are so desirable that no one ever resigns a Government job, when the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] has just quoted figures to show that here in the city of Washington there were 75,000 appointments and 40,000 resignations in the period of a year.

Mr. NOLAN. In less than a year.

Mr. KEATING. In less than a year. That shows how desirable these Government jobs are considered. And yet gentlemen tell you that there is a great scramble for these places.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. No. The gentleman could have quoted these figures when he had the floor. He is perfectly familiar with them.

Now, my friends, this bonus is asked to compensate Government employees for a condition that we know exists, to wit, an increase in the cost of living. It is not necessary to submit statistics. Every man within the sound of my voice knows that since the beginning of the European war there has been an increase in the cost of the necessaries of life of at least 100 per cent, and that the Government clerk who was getting $1,200 a year at the beginning of the European war is now, so far as purchasing power is concerned, receiving only $600 a year. Within the last year there has been an increase of 18 per cent in the cost of living and prices are still going up.

It is also true that the Government of the United States, dealing with other employees, with those who are on the railroads of this country and in the shipyards of the country, through the War Labor Board, has granted awards on account of the increase in the cost of living that make this proposal seem small indeed. All we are asking you to do is to treat the clerical employees of this Government with the same generosity and the same justice that has been accorded to other employees of the Government.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will be adopted, because it only does substantial justice to the employees of this Government, and it will add immeasurably to the efficiency of our service.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am sure we do not want to do injustice to the men and women who are engaged in the Government service. Neither do we want to do injustice to the Treasury of the United States. Let us stop a minute and see what it is contemplated to do. We have passed an appropriation bill for the Post Office Department, and in that have given an increase of $200 to the men who work outside of the city of Washington, but for the 90,000 Government employees in Washington you propose to give an increase of $360 a year. The statute fixes the pay of common laborers at $660 a year. We give them 7 legal holidays with pay. We give them 60 days vacation every year with pay. In addition to Sundays and these vacations, you propose now to fix the standard here for common laborers, the commonest laborer, at $1,020 a year. I say that any man who votes for that and then hires a man in his own employment and pays less than that is a different kind of individual than I think sits on the floor of the House. You propose to pay charwomen by this measure $440 a year for three hours' work, at a maximum, per day; and any Member of the House who will vote for this proposition and then employ in his own home one of these same charwomen and pay her less than that is unworthy to sit here on the floor of the House. Let us be fair. Let us treat the Treasury with the same consideration that we treat our own pocketbooks. The standard we fix to-day must be the standard that the business men of the country must adopt. When the committee was considering this matter a girl from one of the congressional districts represented by one of the members of the subcommittee, who came here at $1,200 a year, paid out of a lump-sum appropriation in the War Department, and whose salary was increased to $1,400 a year, was notified that her services were no longer necessary. She came and asked this Member to get her a job in Washington, and said she would take $1,000 a year, for that was more than she was getting at home; and yet this amendment would give her and thousands similarly situated $1,750 per year. Let us think of the Treasury. The Agriculture Department says that next year the guaranteed price on wheat will cost the Treasury $1,000,000,000, which means, if they are to be relied upon, that the price of all food must come down during the period for which we are making this appropriation. Let us make this appropriation in fairness to the employee, but for God's sake let us think something of the Treasury of the United States at the same time, and let us remember that you and your constituents will be called upon to supply with funds, to buy bonds, to make good the amount that you are voting out to-day. Let us be fair to all of them. I wish we could go into this matter; I wish we might take the time to consider it, so that we could see that the committee has been fair, absolutely fair, to these employees of the Government; and in order to be sure that we were fair we provided for a commission that would go into this whole question and then in a broad way, without taking dictation from any source, determine what was a fair wage for all of these employees in the various departments, and upon that report base legislation that would be absolutely fair to all of our people, both the Government and those who work for it.

Mr. GORDON. When does the increase provided for in this bill go into effect?

Mr. GOOD. It is for the fiscal year beginning July 1 next.

Mr. GORDON. Ending July 1, 1920.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope we will look at the proposition presented to the committee in a fair way, with regard not only to the employees of the Federal Government but also the taxpayers who have to foot the bills. I have noticed that in the remarks of these gentlemen who have appeared in support of this amendment not a single reference has been made to the taxpayer whom they represent on the floor of this House. Here is a proposition that contemplates adding $50,000,000 to the expenses of the Government by way of a bonus to the Federal employees at a time when the people of this country are being taxed billions of dollars to pay the expenses of the war in which we have been engaged, and the interest upon the bonds which have been issued during that war. We are asked to add $50,000,000 to this bill as a bonus at a time when the revenue bill is now pending in conference, which proposes to tax the people $6,000,000,000 for the next fiscal year in order to meet the expenses of your Government, and in addition to that we are confronted with the necessity of issuing four or five billion dollars in bonds to make up the deficiency. It is time to call a halt; it is time to take into consideration those back home, who will be required to pay the appropriation you are proposing to make. The question is going to be asked of you when you get back home whether or not you gave them due consideration in these matters.

What are the facts? A year ago this proposition was before the House. It was given a thorough consideration. There was thorough argument made upon the proposition, and the House by vote during war times fixed the bonus at $120 a year. That, I repeat, was during war times, at a time when the expense of living was certainly higher than it can possibly be during the next fiscal year. You are now asked to fix the bonus at $360 a year, or three times the former amount, in peace times, during the fiscal year 1920, during which no man on the floor of this House will say the cost of living will be greater than it has been during the present year.

What are you going to tell the people you represent back home when you are confronted with the proposition that you voted to increase that bonus during peace times? How can you explain such a position when you declined to make any such increase during war times? How, under such circumstances, can you justify your action in increasing the Government expenditures $50,000,000? Now, gentlemen have referred to the fact and they have commented upon the small amount paid to certain employees of the Federal Government. I am in favor of this Government giving a fair compensation and a living wage to everyone whom it employs. I want the United States Government to be a model employer, and I believe the facts will show that in many respects it is a model employer, although, as stated, some of the lower-paid employees——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky yielded me his time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yielded to the gentleman the time which was allotted to me.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will also yield the gentleman what time I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for eight additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Gentlemen have spoken of the $60 and $70 employee. I want to say to you that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado does not take care of him. It takes care of the man who gets $1,200 and more, for he is the only employee under this amendment who will draw the whole $360. The man who gets $2,500 will get $2,860 if this amendment be adopted; the man who gets $1,800 will get $2,160; but the little man, the man whom you and I would like to see helped, does not get the $360 under this amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. MASON. I ask for information. It does include charwomen who get $27 a month now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do not get the whole amount of $360 under this amendment that is before the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? Does not this bill provide that no person under this clause shall get more than 30 per cent in addition to their present salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the provision to which I alluded.

Mr. MADDEN. So that a charwoman who gets $240 now will only get 30 per cent of that $240, or $72 additional?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Or $6 a month, just what she is getting to-day and will continue to get during the next fiscal year.

Mr. MASON. Then it does include charwomen?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. MANN. Under the form of the bill would it not be necessary to make first an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado before amending the other provision?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know what is in the mind of the gentleman from Colorado; I only know what he has offered here to this committee, and I know that he could have included charwomen and the man getting $60 or $70 a month in the same amendment if he had desired to do so; but what I am calling attention now to is——

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). Is the fact that if we adopt this amendment you are voting to give the man who gets $2,000 and $2,500 $360 extra and you are not taking care of the smaller paid employee to whom the gentleman from Tennessee and others have alluded.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield again——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I can not yield. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that your committee gave this matter very serious consideration. We had hearings upon it, we considered it from every angle, and we felt for the reasons which have been stated here upon this floor, and the fact that during the next fiscal year the cost of living can not possibly be more than it has been during war times, that we would not be justified in reporting to this House a flat provision greater than that which has been carried in war times and which would increase the expenditure of the people $50,000,000. Now, your committee realize that salaries here in the city of Washington are in many respects——

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not yield. Just let me get through. I do not wish to be discourteous but I will be through in a few minutes. Your committee realize that there are many inequalities in the salaries paid by the Federal Government. Your committee realize that some of these salaries may be too small, but I want to ask whether you are going to give this proposed increase and raise those who are getting the larger salaries on the plea that you are trying to help the little fellow. What your committee propose, and what I hope will be adopted by this House, is a joint commission which will take into consideration this whole proposition and after giving it full consideration report to the House as to what salaries should be allowed these employees, not only to those getting these larger sums, but particularly to those who are getting the smaller amounts.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask my colleague a question now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the gentleman think in all fairness that a Member of this House who voted to increase his own secretary's salary $1,200 should vote for this amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only say to the gentleman I did not vote to increase my secretary——

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And more than that, I want to say that those gentlemen who voted to increase the compensation for clerk hire did not do so, as I understand it, with a view of increasing the secretary they have now, but they did so with a view of providing for an additional stenographer. And they say that $1,200 a year is sufficient for a stenographer, and if $1,200 is sufficient to pay for a busy stenographer, who works all hours of the day here at the Capitol, then I want to ask the gentlemen why they think stenographers in the departments, who get, as the gentleman from Iowa said, 7 days holiday, 60 days leave on full pay, and Sundays, are entitled to more. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, if it is now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. By substituting the figures "$240" for "$360."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Strike out the figures "$360" and insert in lieu thereof "$240."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If this amendment to the amendment should be defeated and the original amendment should be defeated, would it then be in order to offer as an amendment to the original text of the bill to strike out and insert $240?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair it would be.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, upon the proposition of the parliamentary inquiry just submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I understood——

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition submitted, as understood by the Chair, is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] increases the amount from $120 to $360. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] offers an amendment reducing that sum to $240—an amendment to the amendment. The inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was if the amendment and the amendment to the amendment were defeated would it be in order to offer an amendment fixing the amount at $240.

Mr. MANN. The Chair was right.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the $240 proposition is defeated, and then the $360 proposition is defeated, will it be in order to again offer the $240 proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair it would be in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Although it has been voted on one time?

Mr. MANN. But under different conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would be in order. The question is on the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 91.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KEATING. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 78.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee and Mr. KEATING took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 93.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$120," on line 18, and insert "$240."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 146, line 18, strike out "$120" and insert "$240."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment on the ground that the committee has already voted on it and rejected it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The answer of the Chairman to the parliamentary inquiry was exactly to the contrary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is in order, there is no limit as to the number of times it can be offered.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The Chair has already held that it would be in order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not asking my good friend from Louisiana.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The Chair could not mislead the House in that way.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is one of the ablest men on appropriations who ever sat in the House, but when it comes to parliamentary law he is not so great. The proposition was not whether you would substitute $240 for $120, but whether you would substitute $240 for $360. Now, the House might have a very different idea between substituting $240 for $360 and substituting $240 for $120.

The two propositions are entirely distinct. And if the gentleman's point of order is well taken the result would be that the committee would be given no opportunity of voting directly on the particular proposition if it wanted to vote $240 in preference to $360.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] propounded the inquiry to the Chair, if it would be in order if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] were defeated, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] were defeated, to offer an amendment to the original text of the bill, increasing the rate of compensation from $120 to $240. The Chair answered it would be in order to do so. The amendment offered by Mr. O'SHAUNESSY was to substitute $240 for $360, and the sense of the committee was taken on the proposition substituting $240 for $360, and the latter proposition was defeated, but the sense of the committee on the direct proposition, to increase the pay of Government employees $240 instead of $120, as proposed in the bill, has not been taken, hence the Chair is of opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is in order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for five minutes on that. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. All time on the pending amendment and all amendments to this section was limited to one hour, and the time is exhausted.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. I dislike to do so, but I will have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. NOLAN and Mr. O'SHAUNESSY demanded a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 73.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee and Mr. NOLAN to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the Nolan amendment.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 79.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 25, page 146, by striking out the word "thirty" and substituting the word "sixty." I want to speak to the amendment after it is reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: On line 25, page 146, strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "sixty."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, I wish to say that the effect of this amendment is simply to make consistent the paragraph so as not to penalize the poorer-paid employees. The committee has just voted to give to the employees a bonus of $240, speaking by and large. As the act was presented by the committee it would have prohibited any bonus that was in excess of 30 per cent, so that although the total amount for the higher-paid employees had been doubled, the effect for the lower-paid employees would be to leave them in just the same situation as they were in. I believe the House, if it wants to increase the pay, wants particularly to increase the pay of the poorer and lower-paid people. Therefore I offer this amendment.

Mr. MANN. I am glad the committee has waked up.

Mr. NOLAN. Would it not have suited better if you had inserted on line 24 the words "who is receiving in excess of $1,000"?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; because there are some instances in which you would not want to make the total increase $240, due to the fact that the employees do not devote their entire time to the work. If this is agreed to, in order not to break the curve, where the figures "$2,620" occur I wish to offer an amendment to make it appear "$2,740."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, might I ask a question of the chairman, if he will permit me?

Mr. SHERLEY. Very well.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Suppose the House would adopt the original $120 raise. What shape would that leave the language in?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the House wanted to be consistent, it would vote down the second amendment which has been offered and put the bill back to its former situation. There is no difficulty in the House dealing with the matter, but I take it that the Committee of the Whole having expressed its opinion, it is the duty of those in charge of the bill to undertake to perfect it in accordance with the will of the Committee of the Whole, and that is what I am trying to do. [Applause.]

I offer on page 146, line 20, to strike out the figures "$2,620" and substitute "$2,740," and with the permission of the House I will make at the same time the same amendment in line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: On page 146, line 20, strike out the figures "$2,620" and insert "$2,740," and in line 23, same page, strike out "$2,620" and insert "$2,740."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. On page 150, in line 13, I move to strike out the figures "$120" and insert "$240."

Mr. MANN. Page 147?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; that page relates to the $120 compensation in the previous act, the existing law, and ought not to be changed. But the one on page 150, line 13, I move to strike out "$120" and insert "$240."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHERLEY: Page 150, line 13, strike out the figures "$120" and insert "$240."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how about line 9, on page 127?

Mr. SHERLEY. That $200 relates to a different proposition entirely. It is not a question of rate of compensation, but it applies to persons who shall receive the compensation.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 148, line 21, after the word "railroads," insert the following language: "telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems," and on line 23 of the same page after the word "railroads," insert the following language "telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems," so that the provision as amended will read:

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to the employees of the railroads, telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems taken over by the United States, and nothing contained herein shall be deemed a recognition of the employees of such railroads, telegraphs, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems as employees of the United States."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify that amendment by adding the words "express companies" before the word "telegraph" in the amendment in both the places where it occurs.

I do not think it is necessary to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by inserting before the word "telegraph," in both cases, the words "express companies."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the heads of the several executive departments and other responsible officials, in expending appropriations contained in this act, so far as possible shall purchase material, supplies, and equipment, when needed and funds are available, from other services of the Government possessing material, supplies, and equipment no longer required because of the cessation of war activities. It shall be the duty of the heads of the several executive departments and other officials, before purchasing any of the articles described herein, to ascertain from the other services of the Government whether they have articles of the character described that are serviceable. And articles purchased by one service from another, if the same have not been used, shall be paid for at a reasonable price not to exceed actual cost, and if the same have been used, at a reasonable price based upon length of usage. The various services of the Government are authorized to sell such articles under the conditions specified, and the proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 151, line 9, after the word "receipt," insert the following:

"Provided, That this section shall not be construed to amend, alter, or repeal the Executive order of December 3, 1918, concerning the transfer of office material, supplies, and equipment in the District of Columbia falling into disuse because of the cessation of war activities."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on December 3, 1918, the President issued an Executive order providing that all the excess materials, supplies, and equipment in the various departments of the Government here in Washington should be turned over to the General Supply Committee, and that departments needing additional office material and supplies should purchase through this General Supply Committee. Now, it has been thought that the provision as written in the bill might serve to repeal the Executive order and that these departments might feel authorized to purchase through the machinery of the department rather than through the General Supply Committee. This amendment is offered in order to guarantee that these purchases shall be made through the General Supply Committee appointed by law.

Mr. RAKER. I understand that these supplies are on hand and that there is much of this material. Will this bill provide a means by which the other departments which need supplies shall take what is on hand rather than go out and buy new material?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the object of the section and was the object of the order of the President issued on December 3.

Mr. RAKER. When one department gets through with the material that it has on hand, is there any objection to taking care of it until the other department takes charge of it? For instance, down here at Sixth and B Streets, in the Ordnance Department, there is a good deal of material that for the last month or two has not been used in the way of desks and filing cases. Those things are needed in other departments, and they ought to be turned over without selling them at half or one-third price.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is clearly correct, and that is the object of this provision.

Mr. RAKER. I am very glad the gentleman has placed it in this bill. It is fine. It will save the Government a million dollars.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be permitted to divert from the subject before the House for a few minutes. Yesterday morning's Washington Post contained a statement made by Mr. Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, before the Committee on Immigration, in which it is said that there are a certain number of unemployed men about the country. He gave the number unemployed in various cities. Among others he named the city of Aberdeen, Wash., where he is quoted as saying there were 3,000 unemployed laborers. I was under the impression that Mr. Morrison was in error. I happen to be president of a logging company with headquarters in Aberdeen, Wash. I wired to a gentleman in Aberdeen to know as to the correctness of that statement made by Mr. Morrison, and I will ask the Clerk to read a telegram which I received in answer to a question that I asked as to the correctness of the statement. I set forth in detail exactly what Mr. Morrison said.

ABERDEEN, WASH., January 17, 1919.

J. W. FORDNEY,
499 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Several mills down for repairs; several running nights. Camps not in full operation yet. This is only temporary. Have interviewed the principal banker, the largest logger, the manager of the largest shipyard, and other large employers of labor, also the chief of police, and the concensus of their opinions is that there is employment here now for all men that are available, and that a normal resumption of the lumber industry will develop a shortage of 1,000 men in this district. Our own operation is short-handed, though we have some of the finest camps ever built and are complying with the rates fixed by the spruce production division, ranging from 50 cents to $1 per hour for an eight-hour day. The metal trades union, representing about eleven hundred men, are on strike at shipyards. They are demanding $8 for mechanics, $6 for helpers, and $5.50 for laborers. They should not be considered as unemployed.

WALTER L. STOUTE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Gentlemen, Mr. Stoute is superintendent of the company of which I am president. That telegram states that we are paying from 50 cents to $1 per hour for an eight-hour day's work. That means that section hands on the railroad are receiving $4 a day for an eight-hour day. Other labor in the camps is receiving as high as $8 a day for an eight-hour day. When Mr. Morrison states that there is a surplus of labor in the country for which employment can not be found he misstates facts, if he made that statement. There is employment for every man who wants employment to-day anywhere about the country wherever I have information on that subject.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. RAKER. I was present as one of the members of that committee when Mr. Morrison made that statement; and he made this further statement, that a great many concerns, particularly the packing houses and others, claimed that there was not a shortage of labor unless there were four or five men standing at the gate waiting for one man's job.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me tell you where there is a shortage. Go down on Fifteenth Street this afternoon, and in front of Keith's Theater you will find people standing in line for 100 feet outside of the door waiting for an opportunity to buy a ticket to the theater. There is a shortage of seats in amusement places. There is no shortage of employment for men in this country at this time.

Mr. GARNER. We have just voted an increase of salary so that those people can buy additional tickets.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I am in favor of good salaries and have always paid them all of my life, and I am a workingman myself. There is no shortage of labor. There were American casualties in this war to the extent of about 500,000 men, when the truth is known. That number of Americans have been killed or wounded and put out of commission in this war. To take 500,000 men out of this country, as the war has done, who will be unable hereafter to fill the position of an able-bodied man, with yet more than 2,000,000 men in the Army, and then to make the statement that there is a shortage of employment for labor in this country is to make a statement that is not true. Mr. Morrison's information is wrong.

Mr. MASON. May I ask the gentleman whether it is not true that in the building trades in great cities like Chicago there is a large number of unemployed men?

Mr. FORDNEY. This morning, in my office, I asked an employer of labor, who is a Chicago contractor, about that, and he said that with a fine-tooth comb you can not find unemployed men in Chicago. That is my information this morning. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That a joint commission is created to be known as the "joint commission on reclassification of salaries," which shall consist of five Senators, who will be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives, who will be Members of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the entire section may be read, and that at the end of the reading of the section amendments for reservation of points of order may be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the entire section be read at this time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request with reference to section 9, in order that it may not be necessary to do it at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the rates of compensation paid to civilian employees by the municipal government and the various executive departments and other governmental establishments in the District of Columbia, except the navy yard and the Postal Service, and report, by bill or otherwise, as soon as practicable what reclassification and readjustment of compensation should be made so as to provide uniform and equitable pay for the same character of employment throughout the District of Columbia in the services enumerated.

The commission is authorized to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such personal services and incur such expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section.

The heads of the various governmental services and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall furnish office space and equipment, detail officers and employees, furnish data and information, and make investigations whenever requested by the commission in connection with the purposes of this section.

For payment of the expenses authorized to be incurred there is appropriated $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately and to be disbursed upon vouchers approved by the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve it for a moment.

Mr. WALSH. I intend to make the point of order, but I shall reserve it for a moment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a similar provision to this was adopted on the Post Office appropriation bill with reference to postal employees. It went through without a point of order being made against it. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order now, because it has been stated here on the floor of the House, and it is true, that there are a number of employees here in the District of Columbia who are getting very small salaries, while there are other employees who are getting salaries that are larger than is being paid for similar clerical services in other departments. In short, there is the greatest inequity, the greatest want of uniformity, running through all of the departments with reference to salaries. I think the next Congress can, after a report is made by a commission consisting of five Senators and five Representatives, pass through here some legislation which will correct these inequalities and do justice to these employees. Members have said on the floor that Government employees are not receiving now the amount of money that is being paid in private employment. That I do not admit; but if it is true, then it can be corrected upon a proper report. I trust the gentleman will not make the point of order, but will permit it to go through, just as he did with reference to the Post Office appropriation bill. I regard this as very important. Let us get the facts and then do the right thing both by the Government and its employees.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman that the next Congress, I think, will be able to correct inequities much better than the present Congress, but it will not need a joint commission to furnish information in order that it may do so. The gentleman refers to the Post Office appropriation bill. No one could make a point of order on that bill. One afternoon here when there were very few people present, before any of us knew what was in the Post Office appropriation bill, unanimous consent was granted that everything in the bill should be considered in order notwithstanding the rules of the House. We have just corrected inequities in salaries, at least that was the argument made by those advocating the $240 increase, and we are not going to further correct those inequities by having a joint commission comprised of five Members of the House and five Members of the other body to report during the next Congress. For all we know, before they get a chance to organize we may be back here at work on the regular work of the Sixty-sixth Congress. I submit to the gentleman that to expend $50,000 in addition to the great amount of money that will have to be appropriated to carry this $240 increase will not be worth the candle. I make the point of order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to withhold it for a moment.

Mr. WALSH. No; I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the temporary office buildings erected in the District of Columbia for use of the various branches of the Government in connection with the prosecution of the war shall not be removed except as authorized by law, and their care, maintenance, and protection shall be under the direction and supervision of the Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building.

Space in said temporary buildings and space available for office purposes in other Government buildings, owned or leased, in the District of Columbia shall be allotted and assigned, upon order of the President, in such manner as to provide for their maximum economic use by Federal activities only, with a view to removing as soon as possible from rented quarters all services that can be housed in the Government-owned buildings.

Appropriations for rent of office space, contained in this or any other act, for the fiscal year 1920, except for space under lease for a term of years expiring after June 30, 1919, shall be available only for obligation for rental of such office space in the District of Columbia as may be determined by the President to be necessary in addition to the space available in Government-owned buildings.

Appropriations or allotments for rent, and for the care, protection, maintenance, and repair of rented quarters, after allowing for the payment of outstanding obligations, shall be covered into the Treasury immediately upon the housing of the respective services in Government-owned buildings for which funds are available for such expenses.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to the point of order, and I take there is nothing that I can say to the gentleman to induce him to withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I am willing to reserve it for a moment, but I will say that I am unalterably opposed to keeping these temporary buildings in the parks where the Government has stolen space that ought to be devoted to park purposes. Here is a provision that they can not be removed except as authorized by law. That means that they will be there until they fall down.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think Congress ought to have some authority?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As to when they shall be removed?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think they ought to be removed at the earliest possible moment, as far as I am concerned. I do not think the difficulty will be in keeping them there; I think the difficulty will be ever to get them removed. Now, the gentleman proposes to put in permanent legislation a provision that those buildings shall not be moved. Why, I remember the fight there was here for years to get the Pennsylvania Avenue station off the Mall, and various other fights. I went through one in Chicago with my colleague here to get the old temporary post office off the lake front and the old exposition buildings, and year after year that fight continued before they were gotten off, and it will be difficult enough to get them off here. Now, to say by way of legislation that after a building has fallen down that you can not change it merely through making an appropriation to remove it is, to my mind, contrary to what ought to be done.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is that the only paragraph in this section to which the gentleman has serious objection?

Mr. MANN. I think it is one of the paragraphs.

Mr. GOOD. I will submit to the gentleman that if he will offer a new section there to read, "That the care, maintenance, and protection of the temporary buildings erected in the District of Columbia shall be under the direction and supervision of the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Building," and then following——

Mr. MANN. I have no objection, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will this meet the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out the language on page 153, line 1, reading as follows: "Not to be removed except as authorized by law, and their care, maintenance, and protection"——

Mr. MANN. My objection is to the language, "shall not be removed except as authorized by law." I know, as I say, how difficult it is to get laws passed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I understand the Chair sustains the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to withhold the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to insist upon the point of order, and I was about to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, may I suggest it has been already called to the attention of the gentleman by my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], that if he will transpose the language so it will read, "That the care, maintenance, and protection of the temporary office buildings erected in the District of Columbia for use of the various branches of the Government in connection with the prosecution of the war shall be under the supervision of the Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Building"——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Illinois is sustained.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment for a new section 9, to read as follows: "That the care, maintenance, and protection of the temporary office buildings erected in the District of Columbia for use of the various branches of the Government in connection with the prosecution of the war shall be under the direction and supervision of the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building," and the remainder of the language as it appears in the section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee offers an amendment as a new section, on page 152, to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That the care, maintenance, and protection of the temporary office buildings erected in the District of Columbia for use of the various branches of the Government in connection with the prosecution of the war shall be under the direction and supervision of the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Does the gentleman think that the adoption of this amendment will at all expedite the disposition of these buildings and the return of the sites upon which they are located to their former state?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It will certainly not deter the return and removal of the buildings in any sense. That is what the committee was trying to do, so far as the original section was concerned, to leave the matter altogether with a future Congress as to whether or not they should be removed. This, however, I will say to the gentleman, I think especially necessary, since some one ought to be put in charge of those buildings. They are there, and if they are vacated some one ought to have the care of them. The Food and Fuel Administrations, and I hope a great many of the employees of the Ordnance and other branches of the War Department in Henry Park, are going to be relieved of their duties very shortly, and those buildings will be left there with no one to look after them.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me the proposition ought to be taken care of by Congress by specifying when those buildings shall be removed and then compel the occupants of the various departments to get out before that date. If you are going to leave the care of them to somebody's jurisdiction they will use that fact that they are under their care for an excuse and reason for never consenting that they should be vacated or that those buildings should be removed and taken down.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman presented a very forceful argument this morning in favor of the Department of Commerce occupying some of these buildings.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman insisted very strenuously that those buildings ought to be occupied by Government employees——

Mr. STAFFORD. That was this morning; this is this afternoon.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit that, with all deference to consistency, the gentleman ought not to object to placing the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building in charge of those buildings, so that in those buildings, which will be occupied by certain bureaus of the Government, some one will have authority to see that they are properly taken care of and preserved, and I think this is true also of buildings which will be vacated until they are actually removed, for certainly the Government would not want to turn them loose without anyone vested with authority to look after them.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it is true. The gentleman is correct. I was in favor of the Department of Commerce occupying one of these buildings; but now the gentleman wants to place a building that is not occupied by any Government department under the jurisdiction of the War Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. The superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Building. And that will be used as a reason and excuse for neither removing the building nor disposing of it or having it occupied by any other Government department. The way to handle this thing is for Congress to decide what shall be done with these buildings and to fix the date when they shall be vacated and removed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not disposed to dispute that point with the gentleman; but Congress will be in session, and Congress can very easily determine when it wants these buildings removed; but in the meantime here are the two buildings in Potomac Park occupied by the Navy Department and the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. Who is taking care of them now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building.

Mr. WALSH. There is no authority of law for that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He is taking care of them while the War and Navy Departments are occupying those buildings. Take the War Trade Board Building, which is located on Government land, a two or three story building, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets, near the Mall. Some one ought to be placed in charge of that building. It does not mean any extra expense; it does not increase the salary of the superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building, and certainly some one ought to be vested with taking charge of the property of the Government. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 39 for the purpose of offering a short amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 39 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. We can not hear what it was.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want to go back to page 39 for the purpose of offering a short amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be first reported before consent is given.

Mr. GALLAGHER. On line 17, page 39, I wish to move to change the word "section" to "division" and to add after "chief, $2,250," "assistant chief, $1,800."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that that question was under consideration before the subcommittee and that committee decided not to allow it. Therefore I object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment at the end of the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINGO offers an amendment as follows: At the end of the bill insert:

"Provided, That in the case of space under lease for a term of years no appropriation shall be available until the head of the department in each case shall certify in writing that he has made every proper effort to sublet or procure a cancellation by mutual consent where it is possible to procure space in Government-owned buildings or rent other suitable space at a lower rental than that covered by existing laws."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert the words "for rent."

The CHAIRMAN. At what point?

Mr. WINGO. After the words "no appropriation shall be available."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is too important a subject to be considered at this late hour. The subcommittee on appropriations has given very thorough consideration to the question of rental of occupied quarters, and therefore I make the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. On what ground?

Mr. STAFFORD. The point of order, first, is that it is not offered in the proper place in the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. It is plainly a limitation upon expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is entirely speculative as to whether it would be a saving or additional expense.

Mr. WINGO. It is a limitation on the expenditure. It is the very amendment the chairman of the committee challenged me to offer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no. I did not make any challenge to the gentleman. I would not do a thing like that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether or not it results in the reduction of expense.

Mr. WINGO. It says the appropriation shall not be available except in certain cases, which in itself, on the face of the amendment, reduces the amount of the expenditure in this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not feel called upon to speculate on a question like that in ruling on a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I simply ask the Chair to read the amendment. On its face it provides for a reduction of the sum to be expended.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Chair can not tell whether there will be a reduction or not. No one can tell—not even the gentleman from Arkansas—whether there will be a reduction.

Mr. WINGO. I would like to start even a tendency to stop these extravagant rentals.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. You would not have anyone to take care of the buildings. What would you do about that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not offered at the proper place in the bill. It applies to every item relating to rental, and it is a fundamental principle of the House that in the committee, in considering appropriation bills, that when a provision to which an amendment would be in order is passed you can not at the end of a bill bring up matter that has formerly been considered.

Mr. WINGO. I want to submit this to the Chair: The last thing to which I offered an amendment was a provision relating to rental. All through the bill you find provisions relating to rent. This provision of mine goes to every provision in the bill regarding rent, and requires, wherever possible, that a reduction shall be made in the rent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair made his ruling predicated on the Holman rule, assuming that the gentleman offered his amendment under the Holman rule on the ground that it would result in the reduction of expenditure. Construing the Holman rule Mr. Hay, as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, held:

To be within the Holman rule, the reduction of expenditures must appear as a necessary result of the legislative provision sought to be incorporated.

That ruling was made on January 30, 1915, at the third session of the Sixty-third Congress, page 2748 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 3887, page 591, it is held that an amendment—must not be merely speculative, but must appear on the face of the bill.

The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be permitted to correct totals in the bill wherever necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to correct totals in the bill wherever necessary. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14078) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the so-called clerk-hire amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a separate vote on the amendment regarding clerk hire.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] to section 6, and on the amendments of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], which were offered to perfect the section after the adoption of the Nolan amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does anybody else demand a separate vote?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, on the so-called clerk-hire amendment there are two amendments.

Mr. MANN. No; there is only one.

Mr. SISSON. One fixes the amount at $3,200, with a proviso.

Mr. MANN. There is only one amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will let the gentleman from Kansas have his right. Without objection, as to other amendments than those indicated, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas raises the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-eight gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll, the Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair kindly state what amendment we will vote on?

The SPEAKER. On the amendments in gross which were not segregated.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker announced that those amendments were agreed to. Then the point of order was made that there was not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker announced what?

Mr. MANN. That the amendments not segregated were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Kansas made the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. He did not make the point of no quorum on that vote.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. My point of no quorum was made before that question was put to the House, and not upon that question.

The SPEAKER. What is it that the gentleman wants the yeas and nays upon?

Mr. STAFFORD. He does not wish the yeas and nays. He wants a quorum here.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of adopting the amendments in gross will answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 288, nays 0, answered "present" 2, not voting 140, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the new raise in the railroad rates.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the railroad rates. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object for the present. That ought to be done after this legislation is passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first of these amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: On page 19, after line 12, insert the following:

"Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $2,000 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Amendment to the amendment——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that was not the amendment. The Clerk has not reported the amendment correctly. There is but one amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. The committee adopted two amendments, but they are to be reported as one amendment.

The SPEAKER. Give the Clerk a chance to read it.

Mr. MANN. But he commenced wrong.

The SPEAKER. That is true, but he can correct it. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 12, on page 19, insert:

"Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: For clerk hire of each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $3,200 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that was corrected to $1,408,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. No vote was ever taken on that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us see. Had we not better take the Clerk's report rather than a statement from the floor. Does not the gentleman think that is fair?

Mr. MANN. Certainly, but the Clerk was directed to put in the correct amount, and I got the correct amount from the other clerk then doing the work.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Unanimous consent was given to correct the totals?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. If this amendment be not agreed to, will it then be in order to offer a motion to recommit, restoring the language of the bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. You can put anything in a motion to recommit that is not subject to the point of order. The Clerk will finish reading the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

$1,408,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no part thereof shall be paid to any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If this amendment should be voted down, what provision would there be then in the bill for the pay of clerk hire to Members?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. That is a judicial inquiry.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

[Cries of "Regular order."]

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It is a question of what would be the status of the bill if it was stricken out.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. The amendment as it now stands has two substantive propositions in it, and while it was an amendment adopted to the Stafford amendment, there were two substantive propositions. In the House can a vote be had on the two propositions?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What two propositions?

The SPEAKER. Certainly they can have a vote on the two propositions, if one of them modifies the other.

Mr. SISSON. What I rose for is to inquire if it is divisible; and if so, I want to ask for a separate vote on the so-called Good amendment to the Stafford amendment or to the amendment increasing it to $3,200.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, there is only one amendment here. There are two propositions contained in it; first, that it appropriates $3,200, and next the proviso that this money shall not be paid to the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner. In the Committee of the Whole, in the orderly process of forming the amendment, amendments to the amendment were agreed to; but as finally completed there was but one amendment. That amendment was to appropriate $3,200 for the pay of clerks to Members with the proviso that it should not, however, be paid directly to the Member. I submit you can not go back and have a separate vote in the House on an amendment to an amendment in Committee of the Whole or on the various amendments which might have been offered perfecting that amendment in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not concede that necessarily determines whether there are two substantive propositions in the amendment, because in the Committee of the Whole unquestionably if it had been offered as one you could have divided the question. The test, it seems to me, here is, have you two substantive propositions, although both those propositions might have been added as separate votes in Committee of the Whole to one amendment, and thereby to be called one amendment in the House. In the amendment there are two substantive propositions.

The SPEAKER. What are they?

Mr. SISSON. First, fixing the amount at $3,200, and second, that the money shall not be paid to the Member himself.

Now, I want a separate vote on these two propositions.

The SPEAKER. Now, that second proposition is simply a modification of the first proposition, is it not?

Mr. SISSON. It is not only a modification, but it is so substantive that a man might be willing to vote for the amendment without the proposition, but unwilling to vote for it with it. That is all I desire to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the rule is that on the demand of any Member before the question is put the question shall be divided if it includes propositions so distinct in substance that if one be taken away a substantive proposition shall remain. My recollection is that this must apply to each of the propositions, that either one being taken away a substantive proposition must remain upon which action can be taken by the House. In other words, where an amendment is proposed containing two propositions where the House may reject one of them and then might agree to the other having a substantive proposition the amendment is divisible, but that is plainly not this case. The House can not adopt this provision which the gentleman seeks to have voted upon separately and make any sense, "Provided, That no part thereof shall be paid to any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner." I will not say can not, because the House could agree to it; but it means nothing. It is not a substantive proposition by itself. It must, if agreed to by the House, come in with the main proposition making an appropriation and instead of being a substantive proposition it is a subsidiary proposition to the main proposition.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, a parlamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. With the amendment offered as it is, it is extremely doubtful whether any money could be paid out under this amendment at all, but it is a substantive proposition to be voted upon in the order in which amendments shall be voted upon in the House If it is voted down then the $3,200 is voted directly to the Member.

The SPEAKER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Suppose the House were to vote down the first proposition and vote in the last proposition. Would there be any sense at all in the amendment?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely not; and therefore I do not believe the House would do anything like that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but the House can do what it pleases.

Mr. SISSON. But I do not believe it will do anything as foolish as that.

The SPEAKER. It is not divisible.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WATKINS. If I may be permitted to answer that question——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already answered it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] demands the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a unanimous-consent request. I do not know whether there will be any objection to it, but the word "hire" appears in this amendment twice. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be amended by striking out the word "hire" where it appears the second time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks to strike out the word "hire" where it appears the second time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 146, answered "present" 7, not voting 127, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina (for) with Mr. DOMINICK (against).

Mr. SMITH of Idaho (for) with Mr. REAVIS (against).

Mr. SNELL (for) with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. SABATH with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH with Mr. HEATON.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ESTOPINAL. I answered "present," but if I were not paired I would vote "nay."

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. NICHOLLS. If he were present he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay." I am recorded as "present." I want my pair fixed properly.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think on a matter of this sort, where it is so close, involving the membership of the House, there ought to be a recapitulation.

The SPEAKER. I think the gentleman is entitled to his recapitulation. The Clerk will recapitulate the vote.

The vote was recapitulated, and the result found as above recorded.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the Clerk to read the name of Mr. EMERSON as answering "present." I understood him, though I am not clear about it, to come to the desk and change his vote from "present" to "nay." Am I right about that?

Mr. EMERSON. I stated that I was paired with the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ESTOPINAL, but if I had not been paired I would have voted "nay."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are two amendments to section 7, if that is the number of the section.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are more than two, I think.

The SPEAKER. There were three that were asked to be voted on separately. The Clerk will report the Nolan amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that all of those amendments to that section be voted on together.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will permit, that if the House will vote down or vote up the Nolan amendment, the other two amendments will follow, I think.

Mr. MANN. I think it is proper they should go together.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that all these amendments on this subject be voted on together. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Nolan amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nolan amendment: Page 146, line 18, strike out "$120" and insert in lieu thereof "$240."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Nolan amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 202, nays 81, answered "present" 3, not voting 144, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. SNELL.

Mr. HAMLIN with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. SMITH of Idaho.

Mr. DELANEY with Mr. REED.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BOOHER, and I wish to withdraw my vote of "aye" and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. TREADWAY, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sherley amendment: On page 146, in lines 20 and 23, strike out "$2,620" and insert "$2.740," and on page 146, line 25, strike out "30" and insert "60," and on page 150, line 13, strike out "$120" and insert "$140."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. GARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the gentleman's motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARD moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: On page 19, line 13, strike out the language of the Stafford amendment as amended and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $2,000 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary, and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a motion.

Mr. GARD. What point of order was made by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. The point of order was that the amendment proposed to strike out the amendment to which the House has just agreed.

Mr. GARD. The object of the motion to recommit was confined to a part only of the action of the House and not to the entire language of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the gentleman's motion to recommit in the nature of an amendment or instruction would repeal the Stafford amendment that has just been put into the bill by a vote of the House.

Mr. GARD. Only a part.

The SPEAKER. I do not know. If it is bad in part, it is bad in the whole. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Arkansas rise?

Mr. WINGO. To offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. WINGO. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 122.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, for the day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SMITH of Idaho (at the request of Mr. FRENCH), for the day, on account of illness.

CENSUS BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we take the census bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and agree to the request for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. STAFFORD. At this late hour, Mr. Speaker, I think it should go over until Monday.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do at this late hour.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

SUNDAY, January 19, 1919.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, Jan. 14, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR GALLINGER.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions and move their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 417) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of the Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, my late distinguished colleague, the Hon. JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER, was the leader of his party in the Senate and the veteran of this body by two full years in point of continuous service. He entered the Senate March 4, 1891, serving without a break to the day of his death, August 17, 1918, a period of 27 years.

Senator GALLINGER began his political career in the New Hampshire Legislature in 1872, serving there for several terms, and later three terms in the State senate, where he was twice president. He was a Member of the National Congress for two terms before he entered the United States Senate. For many years he was chairman of the Republican State committee in New Hampshire.

The duties of these various offices he discharged with industry, intelligence, and dignity. He leaned toward the formal in his conduct of public business, but he was delightfully informal, genial, and kindly in his own home and among his friends. He was ever ready to perform favors for friend or foe. He was of an optimistic temperament, wholesome, sane, uniformly cheerful and courteous. It is delightful to one who has been his persistent political adversary from his home ward to the forum of the Senate to be able to accord to him, without reservation, so much of praise.

His character and his attitude toward public questions were conventional and consistent. One who had followed his course for a few years could foretell with certainty how he would vote on any matter of importance. He was sure not to be "the first by whom the new is tried," and he was always among "the last to lay the old aside."

Senator GALLINGER was a natural conservative. Hard work and persistent effort had lifted him from lowly circumstances to a position of power and influence among his fellows. The game of life was played in his generation according to his tastes and inclinations. He believed that any man of average intelligence could get on in the world if he would be sober, industrious, and thrifty. He did not believe that the country nor the Government owed any man more than this opportunity.

I think Senator GALLINGER was frankly puzzled at the era of change and reform in which he spent his declining years. I used to see him in the Senate gazing at some colleague whom he believed to be honest, wondering how any intelligent man could utter such foolishness.

More than once he has said to me in substance: "I suppose you young chaps consider me very old-fashioned. Perhaps I am. But things look to me now as they have all my life. I believe I am right, and I shall stick it out if I have to stand alone."

His long and elevated allegiance to prohibition and woman suffrage testify to his courage and independence. I sincerely believe that the inevitable adoption of Federal amendments on these subjects was hastened several years by his advocacy and support. In these two respects he departed from conventionalism and conservatism and became progressive and radical. I think he delighted in thus straying occasionally from the beaten conservative path and plucking a few nosegays from Bohemian fields. Most of his political associates were opposed to prohibition, and nearly all of them abhorred woman suffrage, particularly in the early days. But he never faltered.

The name of my late colleague has been familiar to me from boyhood. All my life he has been a leading citizen of my native city. I remember hearing my father speak of him in 1876, when I was only 7, and my father and Dr. GALLINGER, as he was then known, were members of the New Hampshire constitutional convention. His children were my playmates and schoolmates, and his daughter sat beside me during our first year in the Concord High School.

Dr. GALLINGER enjoyed a good practice as a physician in the best circles of Concord before he entered Congress, in the days when a physician was not a specialist, but an all-around general practitioner, family adviser, and friend. My townsmen referred to him to the last as "Doctor" GALLINGER, feeling in some way that that appellation was less formal than that of "Senator."

He was always prominent in advancing the cause of our city and our State. In the old days there were perennial contests in the State legislature and before the courts between the Concord Railroad and the Boston & Maine Railroad, which was then called a "foreigner." Dr. GALLINGER and my father always worked together for the interests of the Concord road against the foreign invader. And it was characteristic of Senator GALLINGER that he continued those early friendships and affiliations throughout his life. He had a great gift in the way of staunchness and loyalty to his friends.

Senator GALLINGER was a tireless worker and had little patience with those who were lazy or inattentive. For 20 years I tested his skill in political campaigns, and I never knew it to fail. No detail was overlooked. He kept track of every absent voter and found time to take a friendly interest in promising young men of both parties just approaching their majority. The Democratic Party won no important victories in New Hampshire until he retired as chairman of the Republican State Committee in 1908.

My relations with my colleague were always cordial in private life. In the Senate we usually voted against each other, but we never clashed in debate after the tariff contest of 1913. We found many opportunities to reciprocate favors, and we never hesitated to confer on matters in which our constituents were interested.

I can testify with authority to the universal esteem in which my late colleague was held by Senators on this side of the Chamber. I leave it to those who were associated with him long years in the Senate to speak of his services here. I have tried merely to outline his many fine qualities as observed by a political antagonist of a younger generation who knew him as a good neighbor, a kind parent, a devoted husband, and an exemplary citizen.

New Hampshire mourns his loss.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, "the man who was one of us has put on the garment of Eternity and become radiant and triumphant; the present is all at once the past; Hope is suddenly cut away and only the backward vistas of Memory remain, shone over by a light that proceeds not from this earthly sun."

"This is a transition out of visible Time into invisible Eternity."

And the questions which arise as we mourn for the friend who has gone and strive to do him honor are two: What did he do in the life that was granted him among the generation and in the times where his lot was cast; and the greater question, How did he live his life? What a man was is ever more important than what he did. Without misgiving we can ask and answer both questions in the case of Senator GALLINGER. A long life closing with all that should accompany old age, "honor, love, obedience, troops of friends." A life beginning with the earnest pursuit and crowding activities of a noble profession and then passing to many years of devoted public service lasting longer than the lifetime of a generation of men.

For more than 27 years he has served his State and his country in the Senate of the United States. A great trust this and finely executed. No more faithful public servant ever sat in the great body of which he was so long an honored member. His diligence and industry never flagged. He passed daily from the committee room, where most of the hard work—never seen or comprehended fully by the public—is done, to the floor of the Senate to continue his labors there. He was preeminently a good legislator. No measure that interested him, and very few escaped his watchful eye, went through without some improving touch from his skillful hand whenever improvement was needed. He became a very able parliamentarian, although not bred to the law, and was always master of the business of the Senate. He was a strong and effective debater, and upon the subjects which he made peculiarly his own, when he spoke at length it was always with force, with thorough knowledge, and with clear coordination of all parts of his subject and all phases of the argument. His career was one of real benefit and wide-reaching usefulness to his fellow men and of ever-growing distinction until he became and securely held a high eminence as one of the best known and most trusted statesmen of the Republic. The words "ever growing" can be accurately used in regard to Senator GALLINGER, for his mental and bodily strength until two years ago was never abated. He had reached his eightieth year before he had the severe illness which gave the first indication of his advanced age. Even then after his recovery, when he returned to his work, he labored as before and his wise counsel and strong but kindly influence were as potent as ever. Never for a moment did he lag superfluous upon the stage or through disease or weakness fail in any duty.

He had the respect, the confidence, and the affection of his fellow Senators on both sides of the Chamber to a degree rarely equaled. This was not owing to any arts practiced for popularity; still less to being all things to all men, which was impossible to him. It was wholly due to his character, to the quality of the man. In other words, to what he was, the second and the greater touchstone, and this proved him to be current gold indeed. He was a man of strong character and rigid honesty alike in thought, in word, and in action. He had strong likes and dislikes, deep-rooted convictions, and entire courage, and these are the qualities which in the long run always command respect; and if they are allied as they were in him with great kindness, a most genuine modesty, keen sympathy, and a real tenderheartedness for all who sorrow or are heavy laden, affection is sure to follow close upon respect. He was a good man—highest praise of all—never prim or prudish or intolerant, incapable of hypocrisy, and yet always a good man without casuistry or debate and without spot or blemish upon which envy, hatred, or malice could lay a pain-giving touch. He had many a hard-fought contest and he never asked quarter or shrank from striking a hard blow for the truth as he saw it, but about himself he never had anything to explain. His life was an open book and he guarded no secrets.

Many heavy sorrows came to him, and he felt them deeply, but he met them bravely and went on with his public work unrelaxing and undaunted.

So death came to him with the harness on his back, as he would have wished—came to him when he was filled with overpowering, yearning anxiety for his beloved country in the hour of extreme stress and trial. Those who knew him, those who were with him in all his daily work, will miss him sadly. To those nearest and dearest to him he is an irreparable loss. But for him all is well. In the fulness of his years, loved and honored by his friends and countrymen, with but little suffering he has come to the inevitable end. With all truth and with devout and tender feeling we may repeat the beautiful words:

Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, we have assembled to-day to pay tribute to the memory of our late and much-beloved colleague, JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER, who was one of the many great men the State of New Hampshire has produced, and one of the most useful statesmen this body has known.

Other Senators, who feel his loss no more keenly than I do, will doubtless recount better than I can the many interesting facts that concerned his long career of honorable public service. Therefore, I shall speak but briefly regarding those facts.

JACOB H. GALLINGER was born on a Canadian farm and was one of a large family of children. In his youth he learned the printer's trade and later studied medicine, and was graduated in that profession, which he followed until he entered Congress as a Member of the House of Representatives in 1885. He served in the House throughout two Congresses, the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth, declined renomination for election to the Fifty-first Congress, and came to the Senate in the Fifty-second Congress, his term commencing March 4, 1891.

My own service in the United States Senate commenced three months prior to that time, so I was one of those permitted to welcome him when he came. But, alas, it has been more than a decade since the last one of all the others of the then sitting Members of this body passed out of service here. Senator GALLINGER served continuously from his first entrance into the Senate until his death, while my fate was to retire for one Congress. So the Senator had had, in fact, a considerably longer service at the time of his death than any of the remaining Members.

It was the privilege of several of us here to have known Senator GALLINGER during a large part of his 33 years' service in Congress, and I am certain that not one of his former colleagues who have outlived him, whether his acquaintanceship was for a longer or shorter period, will gainsay my statement that Senator GALLINGER was one of the most lovable, faithful, and courteous men we have had with us in this close association of the Senate Chamber, which gives men opportunity to know each other most intimately and to observe at close range each other's human weaknesses as well as strength.

In that connection I am reminded of the words of the essayist, Emerson, who said that "Other men are lenses through which we read our own minds." That idea becomes real to us as we gather here each day and look into the lenses for the thoughts of our fellow Senators and the reflections of our own thoughts. And most of us will recall the many times we have consulted with our friend who has left us, as we have endeavored to inform ourselves and to adjust our own minds.

I have never known Senator GALLINGER to shirk a duty or responsibility. On the contrary, I have known him to be present here and engaged in burdensome tasks when his strength was not equal to the demands made upon it.

We were fellow members of several committees during our many years of service together; but our longest and closest association was as comembers of the Committee on Appropriations, covering a period of 15 years. There it was especially noticeable that the successive chairmen and members alike had the greatest respect for Senator GALLINGER'S sound judgment and keen common sense regarding matters of legislation—partially inherent and partially acquired by long experience and strict attention to his public duties. He could always be relied upon as a sort of anchor when either parsimony or extravagance threatened to upset things somewhat for the time being.

His long service as member and for many years as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia enabled him to contribute to the Appropriations Committee assistance of inestimable value in connection with the ofttimes difficult matters that surround District appropriations. Incidentally, his fairness in dealing with District matters, his willingness to give all factions respectful hearing in cases of dispute, endeared him to the hearts of all District residents who are interested in the legislative and administrative affairs of this city.

While attending strictly to his duties as a legislator, our good friend who has gone beyond did not lose interest in his earlier profession of medicine and surgery. His older friends habitually addressed him as "Doctor GALLINGER"; hospitals were aided by him and named for him; and my belief is that he took great pride in the title and profession.

For many years I have known in what high esteem Senator GALLINGER has been held by all those in the humbler walks of life who have had occasion to consult him about their business and personal affairs. Their verdict has been universal regarding his never-failing kindliness and generosity.

Indeed, we shall never know a kindlier man and friend—and when we speak of him as a consistent, loyal friend, which he was, we give him the highest title we can possibly bestow.

Fast as the rolling seasons bring
The hour of fate to those we love,
Each pearl that leaves the broken string
Is set in Friendship's crown above.
As narrower grows the earthly chain,
The circle widens in the sky;
These are our treasures that remain,
But those are stars that beam on high.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to speak of Senator GALLINGER just as I saw him and knew him and miss him in this Chamber. I knew him and closely observed him here for seven years. At first, Senator GALLINGER was the leader of his party in the majority, and for the last six years he was still the leader of his party while it was in the minority. During the entire time he was earnest, watchful, and vigilant. No Senator was more constant in attendance or readier to handle any question which came before the Senate. He was master of the Senate rules of procedure and a stickler for their observance. While an intense believer in his party, he was broadly patriotic, and no one could fairly watch his course without knowing that his great purpose was to serve his country.

He spoke without display, but with perfect clearness and persuasive logic, and he rarely failed to win the Senate for the side he advocated. His line of thought always showed a purpose to build up and not to pull down. He preferred to praise, not to criticize. He believed in his country; he had confidence in our institutions; he loved his fellow countrymen; he loved to see the best side of everything and everybody. He was an optimist, full of hope and confidence, though anxiously thoughtful of the future. He was kind and gentle and courteous. It was a pleasure to be with him.

Senator GALLINGER was among the foremost of his associates in his work and in their esteem. We cherish his memory. There is much in his record that we may emulate, and not the least his devotion to the Senate and to its constitutional responsibilities, for the disregard or neglect of which he deeply grieved.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I first became acquainted with Senator GALLINGER in 1885, and was associated with him in the House of Representatives in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, of which we were both Members. Our acquaintance ripened into a close friendship, which continued to the day of his death. Neither of us could at that time foresee what the future had in store for us or that we would be associates in the United States Senate for nearly 24 years.

On this occasion I can only undertake to give a brief outline of his noble career and great energy and activity in the public service. He was born on Canadian soil and of German ancestry on the father's side, but in his later childhood or early youth he came to the United States to remain with us the rest of his days. He was not born in the lap of luxury, and his early days were those of struggle, work, and hardship. He, however, managed to acquire a good academic education, meanwhile working for a short time at the trade of a printer.

Shortly after completing his career at the academy, he took up the study of medicine and surgery at the Cincinnati Medical Institute, from which he graduated in his twenty-second year. Shortly after this he settled at Concord, N. H., which became his permanent home, and entered upon the practice of medicine and surgery, in which he was very successful.

A broader and more enchanting field of activity and usefulness, however, soon attracted his attention and aspirations. By his own inclination, and at the instance of his fellow citizens, he entered the political arena and was elected to the State legislature in 1871. He served for several years in both the house and the senate, and during a part of the time was presiding officer of the senate.

After the expiration of his service in the State senate, he was in 1884 elected a Member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and reelected in 1886. In 1888 he declined reelection. He entered the House as an experienced and well-equipped legislator and soon took an active part and became prominent in the proceedings of that body. He was a good debater and an active and energetic committee member, and kept good track of the diversified field of legislation. Had he remained longer a Member of the House, he would undoubtedly have soon taken a front rank and become one of the leaders of that body—a leadership that does not come through favor, but through real worth, ability, and fitness.

On March 4, 1891, he entered the Senate, as an experienced and trained legislator, well versed in public affairs; and he continued as a member of this body until the day of his death, August 17, 1918, when he passed away peacefully near his home in the State he had so long faithfully served, in the eighty-second year of his age, after a service of more than 27 years in the Senate.

Those who are familiar with the work of the Senate know that Senators, so far as their activity as legislators is concerned, may well be grouped into three classes, namely: Those who seldom attend committee meetings and give little attention to the routine work of the Senate, but who participate in the debates and frequently, on occasion, deliver eloquent and instructive speeches on public questions. Then there is another class, who are faithful attendants of the meetings of the committees of which they are members and do much hard and quiet work in formulating legislative measures, but who take little or no part in the debates and seldom deliver any set speeches. And there is also a third class, who are active and energetic in committee work, give constant attention to the proceedings in the Senate, and actively participate in the debates, rather for elucidation and instruction than for display of mere eloquence.

Senator GALLINGER belonged to this third class. He was a most active, energetic, and industrious committee member, constant in attendance and persistent in work. I, as an associate of his for many years on one of the important committees of the Senate, bear witness at first-hand to this fact. He was not only faithful in his committee work, but he was also a faithful attendant of the sessions of the Senate and kept a close watch of, and was in constant touch with, all important measures on the calendar.

But, beside all this, he was a most excellent, ready, keen, and instructive debater, who always elucidated and made clear the subject to which he addressed himself. His aim was to help—to shed light, rather than darkness. He was always earnest and sincere, and this served to add force to his remarks. He was decided and clear and never equivocating or misleading. The public welfare as he saw it—and as a rule he always saw it aright—was his constant aim and lodestar. It was the compass that guided him through his manifold and diversified activities.

He was an ardent protectionist, who never faltered or equivocated. To him it seemed one of the chief mainsprings of our industrial life; and he was as ready to aid the farmer, the lumberman, and the miner of the great West as the manufacturer of New England. His shield of protection was country wide, and wherever needed he stood ready to invoke it.

He labored ardently and long, in season and out of season, to rehabilitate, build up, and enlarge our weak and feeble merchant marine, and had his plan been adopted by Congress when proposed our country would at the outbreak of the great war at least have had some shipping which it could call its own and would not have been entirely at the mercy of other countries. We might have had some swift ocean carriers of our own to carry our troops and supplies to Europe. The subsidies he proposed, which were then so vigorously opposed, seem picayunish and Lilliputian when compared with what has so lavishly been expended under the direction of the Shipping Board during the last two years. Millions have now been expended in lieu of the dollars his plan involved, and we should have had a superior class of ships, too, under his plan.

He took a deep and active interest in developing, enlarging, and beautifying the city of Washington. It was his ambition that the Capital of our Nation should rank and hold its place among the finest and best of all the world.

His activity, however, was not confined to the specific subjects to which I have referred, though these engrossed much of his time. He paid strict attention to the general course of legislation. All important matters of legislation had his watchful care and attention, and he was never at a loss in debating and discussing such measures. Some Senators are content to devote most of their attention to a single subject of importance, but he, while he had his specialties, was not anchored to these exclusively. He took in and devoted his attention to the entire range of pending measures. He was always on the lookout for what he conceived to be mischievous and dangerous measures, and for these he had no mercy and never hesitated to impale them or to point out their dangerous character.

Like many of us, he had at times his trials to contend with. His early life was a time of struggle and trial, but his trials seemed only to increase his zest for work and never ruffled the equanimity of his temper. He was a loyal friend and a genial companion—kind, considerate, and helpful to his associates.

After more than 45 years in the public service, he died comparatively a poor man, but with an untarnishable record and with the love of the people he had so long served. His epitaph will not be like that of some of our modern millionaires, whose record in brief is this:

He was born poor, but by hard work and rigid economy he accumulated several millions. A small portion of this he gave to charity; the balance all went to his family.

A barren life such as this—barren in all but the devotion to Mammon—was not the life of Senator GALLINGER, and fortunately it is not the life, as a rule, of our public men. New England has had many great Senators in this body, but I doubt whether she has had a more useful one than Senator GALLINGER.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the death of the late Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER New Hampshire lost her foremost and best beloved citizen and the country one of its safest and most esteemed statesmen. He was honest and brave, learned and sagacious, true and patriotic, and his death leaves a vacancy in the Senate which can hardly be filled. He will be missed more and more as the years go by. He was a perfect gentleman; a man of constructive ability, of the strictest integrity and unquestioned honor. He was a lover of justice, a fair opponent. He was courteous always in his treatment of those who differed with him. So great has been the implicit confidence of the people of New Hampshire in his wisdom and judgment, so profound was their admiration for his statesmanship, so loyal for his blameless character, that they elected him to represent them in the House of Representatives for two terms, and elected him as their Senator for a continuous service of 30 years.

Senator GALLINGER was a man of wonderful perspective, and his mental horizon was not limited by local conditions or partisan convictions. He took a deep interest in everything that benefited the whole country, and he watched with pride and satisfaction its progress, its achievements, its successes, its industrial and educational advancement. He believed in law and order, and was ever the defender and often the author of legislation the object of which was to make the people of this country happy, contented, and prosperous.

When Senator GALLINGER left the Senate for his home in New Hampshire a short time before the close of the last session of Congress, I felt that he never would return. He was a sick man at the time, and he knew it; but his indomitable will would not allow him to think so, or that his death was near. He expressed the opinion to me that a short time on his farm in New Hampshire would be the means of his securing the needed rest. The announcement of his death was no surprise to me. He was my friend, and my association with him constitutes one of the most pleasant features of my public life. He enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the members of the Senate irrespective of political affiliation. In debate he was always frank, cordial, and courtous. He was simple and direct in thought and action. He was truthful and entirely free from that moral cowardice which breeds deception. Some Senators realize, but few outside the Senate fully appreciate, how great a service he rendered the Nation.

Senator GALLINGER was always a sterling defender of any cause which he espoused, never thinking whether its advocacy would inure to his personal advantage or not. He was modest and unassuming, as every Senator will testify. He sought in his legislative career to check illegal and extravagant expenditures, and to reduce taxation, to encourage manufacture, and the building of an American merchant marine.

I know there often came to our departed friend times of disappointment, times of discouragement, and times when he would have given the richest things he possessed to have received the assurance of the appreciation of his fellow men that has been expressed so freely here to-day. There may be erected to his memory monuments of marble. In this way his name may be kept fresh in the memory of the few. But the statements made to-day tell, as cold stone can never tell, of the things for which he was honored, respected, and loved, and which made him great in the estimation of all who knew him. The regard of one's fellow men is a reward that must be earned, and happy, indeed, is he who gains it; and few there are who gain it in a degree and in a measure so universal and with so many people as did the late Senator GALLINGER.

> In halls of State he stood for many years
> Like fabled Knight, his visage all aglow,
> Receiving, giving, sternly, blow for blow,
> Champion for right! But from Eternity's far shore
> Thy spirit will return to join the strife no more.
> Rest, citizen, statesman, rest, thy troubled life is o'er.

Mr. President, if we could but force our vision through the thin veil that separates this life from the greater life beyond, we would not look upon death with that degree of dread which is so common to mankind. To me death is but the passing from our present existence to a more perfect and active one. What a fortunate thing it would be if our lives were such that with the cable of hope intertwined with faith and charity we could, with properly attuned ears, receive from the Master now and then the message we are all striving for: "All is well."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who is next on the list of speakers, is confined to his room by illness.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, other Senators have given or will give the salient facts relating to the long and distinguished career of Senator GALLINGER, and I shall not duplicate that general statement; but I can not refrain from taking a brief part in the services on this occasion.

Senator GALLINGER represented my native State in Congress for more than twice as many years as any other man in the history of New Hampshire. That long service, and the fact that our views very largely coincided on public questions, brought me into close relationship with him and gave me an insight into his practices and policies perhaps as great as that of other Senators who have served with him for more years.

Senator GALLINGER was a strong party man—a political course which, in my judgment, is the soundest from every standpoint of good government. He recognized that this Government is best conducted only when there are two strong and nearly evenly divided political parties, and that any variation from that policy tends toward personal or individual government. Personal or individual government lessens stability and destroys that responsibility which can only exist with organization. It is true that men who believed as he did and as I do, in such fundamental matters, very frequently find themselves in the position of not approving in all details what their own party for the moment may advocate; and yet they realize, as he did with great broadness and saneness, the desirability of concerted and consistent political action.

Senator GALLINGER was a most industrious man up to the day of his final sickness. Very few men in the Senate gave more detailed attention to the duties of their work than he. The records of Congress will show that up to July 1, 1918, there were few important questions before the Senate which he did not debate with intelligence, and his thorough knowledge of the questions of the day always commanded the respect and admiration of his colleagues. He had an expert knowledge of many of the great public questions affecting the welfare of our Nation equaled by but few legislators in recent years. No man had a clearer conception of a protective tariff or was of firmer belief in that doctrine than Senator GALLINGER. He was one of its most earnest and effective advocates for many years, and his faith in the value of that policy never weakened.

No man in Congress had a more intimate knowledge of the requirements of our country in relation to a merchant marine. He discussed that question many times, covering the entire ground with such thoroughness that it is difficult to add to the arguments he made in favor of a merchant-marine subsidy.

His knowledge of naval affairs and his hearty advocacy of an effective navy were well known, and Senator GALLINGER was a potent influence in bringing that arm of our military service to the high standard of efficiency which enabled it to make possible its great record in the recent war with Germany.

These are but a few examples of his broad knowledge and thorough equipment as a Senator. Most men who have passed the threescore-and-ten mark have lessened their activities, either for physical or for other reasons. There was no failure on the part of Senator GALLINGER to continue his active interest and participation in public affairs long after that period. Indeed, his mental and physical faculties were available until the end.

His was a most friendly, wholesome, and cordial character, helpful to others, genial in his personal relationships, and particularly generous in his attitude toward his fellow men. I can bear witness to these admirable qualities, for from the day I came into the Senate he took an interest in me which was both fatherly and brotherly, and which aided me materially in my efforts to become a relatively useful member of this body.

No State in the Union has been represented in Congress with greater devotion than was New Hampshire by Senator GALLINGER during his long service. He was jealous of everything pertaining to the welfare of his State; and although his service in Congress made him well known to everyone in New Hampshire, I do not believe the people he served so faithfully and well can quite appreciate the keen personal interest he took in them and their affairs.

It is frequently said in a somewhat perfunctory way that this man or that man can not be well spared from the public service. Those of us who have served in Washington for many years know that the average man—in fact, substantially all men—although they may have been useful and even brilliant legislators, drop out without so much as causing a ripple on the surface of congressional life. That is not true, however, of Senator GALLINGER. He was the admired and trusted leader of his party, and those younger in service and younger in years had long trusted that leadership and depended on his sound advice and calm judgment.

I can not express how strongly I regret his passing not only from my own personal but from the public standpoint. If ever a man earned the reward "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," Senator GALLINGER did; and I am sure that sentence expresses the sentiments of his associates in the Senate, all those who knew him, and those represented by him.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, for some time before I became a member of the Senate my sentiment toward Senator GALLINGER was distinctly antagonistic. I had met him casually some 19 years ago. The basis for the feeling which I entertained was the occasional appearance of public criticisms reflecting upon his public service, the principles upon which he acted and the views he entertained upon prime matters of public concern. To me they were the antithesis of everything which I professed and which seemed essential to the ordered and healthy progress of the Nation. In this mental attitude I entered the Senate Chamber.

Senator GALLINGER was the Presiding Officer of the Senate at that time. He administered the oath of office to me, and on that afternoon he called upon me in the offices which had been assigned to me in the building across the way. He spent some half or three-quarters of an hour in exchange of personal reminiscences and courtesies, during the visit giving me much valuable information regarding the details of a Senator's life, for which I felt and expressed my sense of appreciation. Upon parting he expressed his gratification that I had become one of his colleagues, and desired me to call upon him at any time he could be of service. To say that my feeling of mistrust was dissipated by this kindly interest in my behalf is but to feebly express the entire change of sentiment which his kindly and genial companionship impelled.

I took occasion shortly afterwards to express to him my regret that I had formed a hasty judgment of his character and standing upon secondary evidence, which my experience at the bar should have warned me against, and to express the hope that our relations as long as we were here together should be as kindly and as cordial as they had begun; and they were, Mr. President, from that hour to the hour of his death, those of a close, congenial, and affectionate friendship.

Senator GALLINGER stood for many things which I did not approve, and I stood for many things which he could not approve; and it is the close and intimate contact with men like Senator GALLINGER that induces, or should induce, men to modify their judgments of each other and also their convictions of the soundness of their own views; for, after all, however sincere our sentiments and convictions, it is human to err and imperfection is characteristic of all judgments.

Senator GALLINGER was a conservative statesman. He had that rarest of virtues in these days—a moral courage which made it impossible for him to be neutral upon any position, and impelled him to inform the world of his sentiments upon every question confronting him in his capacity as a United States Senator; yet mingled with his conservatism were elements of a progressive nature that were in decided contrast to his general views. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], his former colleague, has directed attention to his championship of the two great liberal issues of prohibition and woman suffrage. He was as earnest and constant in his devotion to these as in his advocacy of or opposition to every proposition which his judgment commended or condemned. It is not an unusual contrast, Mr. President, but in a man of such sterling integrity of conviction it does afford some basis for speculation that views which seem so diametrically opposed to each other should have found in him a common champion.

Senator GALLINGER combined with his sturdiness of conviction, his practice of participating in every important discussion as an ardent and vigorous contestant, all the sterling qualities of a true and perfect gentleman. We have had, during the six years that I have been a member of the Senate, a number of sharply controverted issues and discussions, generating much heated debate and occasionally disturbing the serenity of our proceedings, but he was always considerate of his colleagues and mindful of the limitations of debate.

As his party's leader he bore himself courageously and well, yet I can recall the utterance of not a single sentence, not a single reflection, that left in the mind and heart of any associate a moment's bitterness or pain. That, Mr. President, was the distinguishing characteristic of Senator GALLINGER—his ability to participate in most earnest and strenuous discussion at all times consistent with the highest courtesy. These elements rarely blend together at all times. When they do they should command, as they always must, the instinctive and enduring tribute of affection and of friendship.

Senator GALLINGER served his country for many years, and at the ripe age of 81 passed from this sphere of usefulness into a well-earned eternal rest. I trust, Mr. President, that those who survive us may be inspired with the same sentiments of regret and affection for us when we, "like streaks of morning cloud, shall have melted into the infinite azure of the past."

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, others, from the standpoint of their association with him here, have spoken, and properly, of Senator GALLINGER as a figure in the life of the Nation; of his long service in this Chamber; of the part that he played for so many years in shaping the legislation of the country; of his work in forming the policies of his party; and, through that party's long-continued dominance and his own preeminent position in it, of his share in making the political history of the United States during the past generation. I may not claim the privilege of speaking of him thus. My knowledge of his public life was taken in perspective, because the hopes which I had had and which he, in some measure, I am sure, shared with me, of sitting here as his colleague, never came to fruition. And, Mr. President, it is perhaps not out of place that I should add that I feel myself humbled as I think of myself as his successor.

I was a lad when I first knew Senator GALLINGER, and he had not yet come to his later national fame. He was a physician of merited repute, and such leisure as his busy professional life afforded was spent upon the old estate in the historic town of Salisbury—the home of the Websters—in the ample and hospitable old house to which he turned so longingly in his last stricken days and from which he went the week before his death. My father was a preacher in the neighboring town of Franklin, and on Sunday afternoons he ministered to the diminishing flock which still clung to the ancient temple of colonial faith among the Salisbury hills. As a boy I used to drive there with him as he went to carry his message, and there I first met Senator GALLINGER, whose magnetic personality made an impression upon my youthful mind which later association strengthened and confirmed. From then to the day of his death I was privileged to know him; for the last quarter century of his life to know him intimately; to be associated with him in such of his public affairs as related to the State of New Hampshire or which had their theater of action there; to receive from him confidences such as I have been vain enough to think he gave to few, if any, others; to be with him in times of trial; to share with him his many moments of triumph; to stand beside him in seasons of his grief; and to offer to him all that an ardent and affectionate discipleship could give to a leader.

In consequence, Mr. President, I shall seek to speak of Senator GALLINGER to-day not as a public man, not as a legislator, not as leader of his party in this Chamber and elsewhere, but as a friend.

Nevertheless, it is impossible to view Senator GALLINGER's life in any aspect without taking into the account his public career, which covered nearly half of all his years and which occupied the greater part of the long span from the day of his majority to the day of his death.

When I first knew the Senator he was at the very beginning of his national career. He had served with such distinction in the lower house of the New Hampshire Legislature as to merit his promotion to the State senate, where he was made president of that body. He had conducted successfully, in behalf of a friend, the most prolonged and most bitterly contested struggle for a nomination to the governorship which our party in New Hampshire had ever known; and he had followed that task with equally successful leadership in the election campaign, where, as chairman of the Republican State committee, he wrested victory almost from the jaws of defeat. This achievement had clearly marked him out for further advancement in public life; and he was then in the midst of his first campaign for nomination to Congress—a canvass in which he was confronted by one of the most adroit and resourceful of New Hampshire Republicans, who was supported almost unanimously by the legal profession, to which he belonged, and who, by tactical considerations and by capable service for the party and in office, seemed inevitably destined to win. In that canvass Senator GALLINGER's skill as a political manager was displayed, I have often thought, as never before nor since; and following his nomination he again took the chairmanship of the State committee and carried himself and his whole ticket through to victory.

He entered Congress with the first Cleveland administration. His party was in the minority, but he took his place with the constitutional opposition which our political system provides, and his genius for leadership found immediate opportunity for expression. He took a prominent part in debate, and his vigorous speeches found wide distribution as campaign documents. His second nomination to the House of Representatives came to him without opposition; and again in the chairmanship of the State committee he had the honor of carrying his party to victory in the election. The impression which he had made during his first term was heightened by the activities of his second to such an extent that a serious movement arose in New Hampshire to overthrow the then existing doctrine of rotation in Congress, which limited our Members of Congress to two terms, and to give to him a third nomination by acclamation. Committed, as he felt himself to be, to the existing order, he checked this movement and announced his candidacy for the United States Senate.

That canvass marked the only defeat which Senator GALLINGER's political career has known. His opponent's triumph in the legislative caucus was of such proportions that many observers believed that Senator GALLINGER's political career was ended. But their judgment was formulated without knowledge of the man. He at once announced his candidacy for the senatorial seat to become vacant two years hence; and, freed from the restraints of office and beginning the effort—never wholly accomplished—of shaking himself free from the demands of his professional occupation, he devoted himself to organizing for the contest which lay ahead of him. Against him were arrayed the sitting Senator, one of the most popular of our ex-governors, and others of lesser consequence in the political field. Around Senator GALLINGER were gathered the friends whom he had made in public and private life, and dominating the whole of his canvass was his own inspiring and forceful leadership. He won the nomination, and the election followed in due course.

His early days in this Chamber were affected by differences with his colleague, which arose out of the intensity with which the Senator's first campaign for the Senate had been conducted. The result, I am sure, was a period of stress for both of them, and I know that the reconciliation which was later effected brought equal satisfaction to the two Senators and to their host of friends in New Hampshire.

Following Mr. Chandler's retirement from the Senate Senator GALLINGER's supremacy in New Hampshire became unquestioned. Two reelections came to him by unanimity, and another was won by a secure margin. This contest was the Senator's sunset campaign. He was in his seventy-eighth year; he was running for the first time in a primary and in a popular election of a Senator; he was seeking a fifth term; and it was at a time, within easy recollection, of the Republican division of two years before. His opponent was young, but no younger in spirit than his antagonist; he was active in the canvass, but no more so than his seasoned opponent; he was vigorous and plausible on the stump, but he was unable to match the reasoned arguments of the Old Man Eloquent.

This campaign, Mr. President, brought Senator GALLINGER to new relations with his people, or, to speak more accurately, into renewed relations with them, such as he had not sustained since his second campaign for Congress nearly 30 years before. And it became immediately evident that neither his powers nor his charm had diminished. In that canvass, Mr. President, I was privileged to speak with Senator GALLINGER more frequently than any other of his coadjutors in the campaign, and as we rode, each day and night, from place to place, I think I found a deeper insight into his character than I had before possessed.

His alert mind was keen to seize upon each detail of the trying canvass; his marvelous memory proved an inexhaustible storehouse of opportune citation when confronted with what otherwise might have been a troublesome problem; his unfailing good humor was proof against all annoyances and was no inconsiderable factor in smoothing out the rough places in the journey to success. And when the victory had been won, his great heart not only awarded to each who had assisted him his merited portion of praise, but with characteristic magnanimity it shut out the memory of the injuries which had been sought against him.

He began his last term here with fond expectation of following it to its allotted end. But its cares burdened his strength. He was unremitting always in his attendance here, and his tireless industry never flagged. His serenity of spirit was rarely disturbed to outward appearance, but it was evident that he was greatly perplexed by the national problems which the war had brought. Twice within his last year he came face to face with death; and it was only his iron constitution, preserved by his clean life, that enabled him to come from his chamber of convalescence to the Capitol in order to vote for the declaration of war and to take up his work as a Senator in a war Congress.

How well he did that work has been attested here to-day by those who saw it. How reluctantly he laid it down, I can testify, for I saw him on the day before he left Washington for the last time, and his mind, though looking forward to the healing days which he hoped to pass in the New Hampshire hills, nevertheless looked beyond them to the days of restored strength, when he would be back here again at the tasks which he knew so well and performed so perfectly. But it was not to be. His sturdy figure belied the weakness which his prolonged and excessive devotion to duty had brought upon him, and he left this Chamber, the scene of his labors, and this city, where there arise on every hand so many evidences of his forethought and taste, never to return. And I venture to believe, Mr. President, that nowhere outside of his own State of New Hampshire will there be found those who will mourn Senator GALLINGER more sincerely than in the city of Washington, whose people knew him for years as the painstaking and alert chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia.

Turning to contemplate Senator GALLINGER in the friendly relationship which I am pleased to think so long subsisted between him and me, words elude me as I try to express how much my association with him has meant to me and how much his death means to me now. Deprived of the further benefit of his companionship and inspiration in the flesh, I still love to believe that I retain my connection with him in the spirit, and that my recollection of him will in some measure afford to me the counsel which I never sought of him in vain.

In his last years, Mr. President, Senator GALLINGER drank deeply of the waters of bitterness. His younger daughter was taken from him in the days when her charming matronhood gave promise of happy years to come; the wife of his youth, who had shared with him so many of the years of his distinction, died, instantly, at his side; his oldest son fell dead just as he and his father were returning from a happy journey abroad; and his last-born, in whom centered great hopes for the continuance of the Gallinger name in the profession which the father had so adorned, was tragically taken away. A less robust spirit would have been crushed by all this. There were left to him, however, the sweet solace of filial affection from his surviving daughter and the care of a devoted sister, and to these were added the heightened solicitude of the friends who were now bound to him by stronger bonds than ever. His own serene Christian spirit was no small factor in making the close of his life calm and beautiful; and he died in the fullness of years and of honors, and all that we say here to-day will be reechoed in the hearts of the thousands who knew and loved him.

At the risk, Mr. President, of running counter to the opinions which some have expressed here to-day, I venture to say that Senator GALLINGER did not die as he had wished. In spite of his advanced years, he had reason to think, because of his heredity, that his life still would extend no inconsiderable span. And I know from his own lips that he had looked forward to a time when he could lay down the responsibilities of the Senatorship and take his place in retirement as an elder statesman, viewing and commenting upon the public life of the Nation as the years of his experience would warrant. But, Mr. President, this was not to be. His life was destined to have no evening. He went out while it was yet day and with his labors yet upon him. He went from his work direct to his reward.

And after all, Mr. President, it was fitting that this should be so, and that the old warrior should not have laid off his armor. The memory of Senator GALLINGER inactive would be a strange picture in the minds of those who knew him; and his death in the harness preserves to us his image as he was—earnest, energetic, industrious, and always helpful.

Senator GALLINGER's years were many, but his spirit was always young; and it renewed itself with fresh companionship as his earlier associates fell by his side in his long busy march through life. Around him in New Hampshire in his later years had gathered an ardent group of younger friends who delighted in both his leadership and his companionship. To us he was always "The Chief," and we hailed him thus with respectful affection. He went from us when he was at the height of his years and influence here, and at the moment when his busy mind was active in planning for the hope of his heart so soon to be fulfilled in the restoration of his party to power. And so we saw him in those last days still as "The Chief." And, Mr. President, it is as "The Chief" that we shall ever think and ever love to think of him.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR BRADY.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 418) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of the Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late Senator from the State of Idaho, was born in the State of Pennsylvania July 12, 1862. When yet a child he went West with his parents and located in the State of Kansas. His experience was that of most young men coming into the West and seeking for better things. He was educated at the public schools, taught school for several years, afterwards attended the Leavenworth Normal College. He became interested in the newspaper business and afterwards engaged in the real estate business. He moved to Idaho in 1895, where he immediately took an important place in the industrial affairs of the State, giving his attention particularly to the development of irrigation projects, farming, the development of power sites, and banking. He was very successful as a business man and came to be a man of wealth, as men of wealth are measured in that part of the country. He was active in business affairs and very successful in all business matters up to the time of his death.

He became interested in politics shortly after his coming into the State and at once took the position of a leader in the Republican Party. He was a delegate to the Republican National convention in 1900 and 1908; chairman of the Republican State central committee of Idaho from 1904 to 1908. He received the entire vote of the Republican convention for governor of the State of Idaho in the fall of 1908 and was elected governor November 3 of that year. During that time he also acted as president of the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress. When Senator Weldon B. Heyburn died Mr. BRADY was elected, January 24, 1913, to fill out the unexpired term. He was reelected by the vote of his people November 3, 1914.

Mr. President, as governor of the State, Mr. BRADY devoted his talents particularly to the organization of those departments of our State government which have to do with what might be called the business interests of the State. In fact, under our constitution and under our State organization the governor of the State becomes, in a large measure, the business manager or director of the State; and Senator BRADY devoted his time particularly to the concrete questions which had to do with the development and growth of his State. He did not shirk, either in time or with reference to his personal expenditure, taking care of those things which had to do with the development of our undeveloped resources and inviting citizens from different parts of the country to share with us in the development of those resources.

Senator BRADY was a successful business man, painstaking, thorough, and of untiring industry. He was always generous with his means. It is safe to say that no deserving charity, no needy individual, was ever turned away without some assistance or some help. He gave continuously and generously to all things which had to do with the betterment of society and to augmenting the happiness of his fellows. When he came to the Senate he gave to the public the same untiring energy, the same close, conscientious study and consideration of public questions that he had given to his private affairs. He seemed to transfer all his energy and ability and business training to the service of his State and the Government. His attention to duty, his close application to public affairs, even after he was informed of his shattered health, was a matter of comment by his colleagues and of anxiety to his friends. He was not willing to take his needed rest. He felt that his duty was here in the Senate, and faithfully he remained at his post until actually confined through broken health to his room at home. Genial, always considerate of his colleagues, broad-minded, and generous-hearted, he was respected by all who knew him.

When the war came, Mr. President, no one in this Chamber gave more undivided support to the great conflict in which we were engaged than did Senator BRADY. It will always, perhaps, be a matter of debate in the minds of Senators as to just what their duty is toward the executive department of the Government in time of conflict. Some may entertain the opinion that they should still exercise their independent judgment with reference to matters which touch, directly or indirectly, the prosecution of the war. Others feel it more their duty to yield to the suggestions of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. That matter is not a subject of debate here and now, but it is safe to say that Senator BRADY concluded that it was his duty to follow the Commander in Chief, and, without hesitation, he did so in all instances which had to do with the support of the late war.

His death was a peculiarly sad one. Just entering upon his second term as Senator, while yet a comparatively young man, with a beautiful and happy home, the future seemed full of promise. But it was at this time that the dread summons came, and he, responding with the same cheerfulness, the same uncomplaining fortitude, went with the silent messenger to the undiscovered country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my acquaintance with the late Senator BRADY began after his entry into this body. He was assigned to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I was a member, and our duties upon that committee naturally brought us into close and continued contact. Senator BRADY gave to the duties of that committee his undivided attention. He endeavored to familiarize himself with the military code and with regulations and recommendations of the War Department, that the service he rendered in the consideration both of recommendations and of bills referred to the committee might reflect the ripe fruits of a successful business experience upon full knowledge of the subject involved.

Some of us are prone at times to be lax in the discharge of our committee duties, feeling that others will bear the burden and that personal attention is not therefore a matter of mandatory importance. Senator BRADY never so felt nor acted. Others might be absent from the meetings of the committee; others might, for many reasons, be unacquainted or unfamiliar with its work and with the character and purpose of the bills referred to it for consideration, but Senator BRADY never. He was always in his seat and always vigilant and active both in attention and in inquiry.

His talents were not of the brilliant variety; they were solid, practical, substantial, and if it be true, as Macaulay says, that genius is but another name for a capacity for hard work and unremitting labor, then Senator BRADY was a genius.

He was finding himself, so to speak, when the summons came. Until the declaration of the existence of a state of war with Germany, Senator BRADY's participation in debate upon the floor was intermittent and fitful. I observed that he was self-conscious and seemed to speak under the restraint of new surroundings. This, however, was disappearing, and he took part in the discussion of affairs connected with the War Department with a continually growing confidence in himself, based largely upon his familiarity with the work in hand and with the subject requiring consideration and upon the exercise of faculties which had outgrown the limitations of novel environment and a critical audience.

Bringing to bear upon the duties of the Senate the best faculties with which a Senator is endowed is the highest possible service to himself and to the country. Measured by that standard, Senator BRADY was one of the most useful Members of this body. He was industrious, vigilant, painstaking, and conscientious. He loved his country and his State, appreciated the dignity and the duties of the high position which his people had conferred upon him, and reflected credit upon them and upon himself so long as he spoke for them and for the Nation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, my first intimate acquaintance with and friendship for Senator BRADY commenced when he entered the Senate and later became a member of the Military Affairs Committee and of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Both of us took a deep interest in those committees, because the work that came to both had much to do with the development of the western portion of the country.

As has been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], Senator BRADY's course in the Military Affairs Committee was marked by his attention to every duty that devolved upon him, and the same may be said with reference to the other great committee of which he was a member, namely, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. While it has often been the case that many Senators pay little attention to the important duties which devolve upon committees, this can not be said of him in reference to his attendance upon and work with the committees of the Senate of which he was a member, and particularly the committees to which I have referred. He was always on hand; he always had strong opinions upon all of the matters that came before the Senate and its committees, and dared express them whenever it became his duty to do so.

Mr. President, if I were to speak of that which characterized him most strongly in the Military Affairs Committee, I would say it was his distinct Americanism. Before America entered into the war but after the first gun had been fired in Europe, he had begun to feel, as many of us did, that America must eventually become involved, and he believed in following a course in that committee that would place America in a proper position of preparation and defense if she did become involved. He felt not only that the Army ought to be properly reorganized, but he felt that the young men of America ought to be so trained that if it did become necessary to draw upon the body of citizenship for the young men who were to fight the battles of America there would be created a reservoir from which they could be drawn. The correctness of his opinion, Mr. President, was fortified by subsequent events. America did become involved; and America did have to draw, not from a prepared body of young men as he and others of us of the committee would have had it, but from a selected body of young men under the draft law to fill the armies which were to fight the battles of our country.

Senator BRADY stood not only for universal military training, Mr. President, when it was very unpopular to take that position, but he stood as well for another great act which when he first became an advocate of it was also unpopular, and that was the selective-service law. Whatever was necessary to be done with reference to these two measures and whatever was necessary to be done in order to raise an efficient and an effective army he stood for.

As his colleague the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] stated a while ago, he sometimes hesitatingly surrendered his own judgment as to what was best to be done for fear that by antagonizing the wishes of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he might by such course in some way impair the efficiency of his own country in a war which probably meant its life or death. He thoroughly believed that it was America's duty to play the part which she did play and to lend the assistance which she did lend to win the war which followed. He talked with me many times about this and was always active in doing whatever seemed necessary to raise an efficient fighting force.

Another strong and distinguished characteristic of Senator BRADY, Mr. President, was his devotion to the West and to his State and its interests. He favored the development of the resources of the West, and was always vigilant to do whatever was most conducive to the promotion of those interests and to the advancement of the States of the West amongst the States of the Union. His attention to duty in this regard was, as has been said by others, marked in every way because he was always present in committees and in the Senate to do whatever was necessary to that end.

He was a lovable, chivalrous, and generous soul, and all of us who came in close contact with him found that he was a man of kindly heart and gentleness of disposition; but with it all, Mr. President, there was a firmness about him which made it easy for him to say "yes" or "no" as his duty directed. Even, sometimes, at the expense of offending one who differed from him, he hesitated not at any time to do his duty.

In his death not only the Senate but his State and the Nation have lost a splendid and a useful citizen and public servant. Duty to him was his all-absorbing passion, and—

> He worked attended
> By a strong-aiding champion—conscience—bringing to his work the strong common sense of a faithful, honest man.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, how uncertain life is! We are here to-day, and to-morrow we pass to the Great Beyond; and no matter what position or station in life we occupy, the world moves on with scarcely a ripple, the ranks close up, and the struggle for advancement and existence continues.

A comparatively short time before the death of the late Senator JAMES H. BRADY, even his closest friends thought he had long years of active service ahead of him. If I had been asked who, among all the Senators, would be most likely to live a quarter of a century longer, I would have named among the first half dozen Senator BRADY.

We have in his death another evidence that in the very presence of life there is death. It is fitting upon occasions of this character that we turn from the turmoil of civil duties to consider the work of the reaper Death. These are times of solemnity and bereavement, and language can not portray the emotions of the soul; yet, on the other hand, they teach us the lesson that there is an overruling Power directing the lives of men and nations. They teach us that no man can justly glory in his strength, or stretch forth his hand and stay the sentence of death, or defy the dread summons to join the innumerable hosts whose way lies through the portals of the tomb. They remind us that no man can tell the day or the hour when his earthly estate shall be closed and an account asked for of the deeds done in the body.

Senator BRADY has passed away, but his works live after him. His body now lies in the grave, but the influence of the life of a good, brave, honorable man remains as a legacy to us and his loved ones. The teaching of faith, the consolation of religion, our inborn conviction of immortality, may temper the sorrow of those who loved him; but the wound inflicted by his early call to a better life can only be completely healed by an assurance that they will meet him face to face when their summons to the great beyond is received.

The people of Idaho honored and trusted him, and he was always faithful to their interest. They greatly respected him, and he gave them his personal affection in return. He won their support by his fidelity to duty. His public record is one of which his family and friends may be justly proud. He died in the midst of his labors and his honors, at the very moment of his largest usefulness in the world.

The character of such a man is not an accident. It illustrates not only the principles of American life, but the benevolent working of the laws under which the progress of society is made sure. He made his own way in life, and whatever success was attained by him came through a constant and ever steady application of the best that was in him, always having the goal of his ambitions in sight. We lose much in his death, but those nearer and dearer lose more. I can simply say that the tenderness and solicitude which he evidenced for his friends and loved ones were worthy of a son of God. May the peace and consolation of the Divine Master ever bless and comfort those who are left to mourn.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on occasions such as this we realize the emptiness of words when we try to give voice to the sentiments of the heart. As we meet the friends and family of a deceased associate whom we loved, about all we can do is to extend a hand in silent sympathy and breathe a prayer that the God above may lighten the burden and solace the hearts of the bereaved.

I would prefer to sit silently by and listen to the words of others who speak in eulogy; but it would be doing violence to my feelings if I failed to say a word of appreciation for an associate and a friend whom I have learned to love and esteem.

Born in Pennsylvania, educated in Kansas, school-teacher, editor, business man, one of the high counselors of his party, governor of his adopted State, and later a Senator in this Chamber, the career of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY was typically American.

Senator BRADY was one of the working Members of this body. He had not been here long until his colleagues who had not had the pleasure of his acquaintance in his earlier life began to recognize in him that sound business capacity which was so well known among his constitutents, and which had persuaded them to confer upon him the highest honors within their gift, both in party and State councils.

His work here in the Senate was by no means limited to those subjects which concerned the great West, but it is only fair to say that they were first in his heart's affections. This was not because he did not take an interest in the welfare of the entire country, for he had an abiding faith in its destiny and its greatness, but because he saw the tremendous natural resources of the great West, saw them going to waste, or, at least, not being utilized for the benefit of mankind. He yearned to make the western region blossom as the rose; and I confess I sympathized with him then and I sympathize now with the Senators of the undeveloped States of the West in their ambitions to make their resources serve mankind, and to do it now. It is all very well to have an eye for the good of generations yet unborn, but they will be the more benefited if the present generation shall hand to their unborn children these resources in a state of development rather than in a state of nature.

Senator BRADY realized this very fully, and hence his abiding interest in this great section of the country.

And now, when our victorious soldiers are returning from the field of battle, or from the cantonments, where they have been in training for the defense of the world's civilization, the duty rests upon the Government to give them their opportunity for life's great work, and the Congress ought to give more thought to the resources of the great West and their development, as well as their reasonable conservation. The God of nature gave us these resources for the benefit of man. They were not intended to be wrapped in a napkin and laid away.

If Senator BRADY were here to-day his colleagues who served with him know with what intensity of purpose he would have devoted his time and talents to this work not only that our brave soldiers might be benefited thereby but that all mankind could be prospered. He who serves the present also serves the future, and he who seeks to so dispose of nature's bounty as to serve the future at the expense of the present serves neither. This is a day for practical men, and not for dreamers; and Senator BRADY was a practical man.

When Senator BRADY first came to the Senate he was not given much to speech making; but after a time, and as he became more familiar with his surroundings, "and of the fullness of his heart," he spoke more frequently. While we would not class him as an eloquent speaker, he was always well equipped with his facts and expressed himself fluently, clearly, and convincingly.

His colleagues were always glad to have the benefit of his suggestions on any subject; and if they did not always agree with him, they respected his views on any legislative problem. And who did not like him as a friend and associate? Always genial and gracious, always kindly and generous, always ready to lend a helping hand in any worthy cause, always of even temper. No one who knew him could think of his doing an unmanly thing, or of uttering a harsh word toward his fellow men.

The world is the better for his having lived. All who were privileged to know him regret his untimely taking off.

Peace to his ashes!

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I deem it a privilege to have this opportunity to add my humble tribute of esteem and affection to the memory of our honored colleague, Senator BRADY.

Although born in Pennsylvania and educated in Kansas, Senator BRADY was distinctively of that type of forceful, constructive business men who were developed by the environment peculiar to our Far West in the latter part of the last century.

In the last decade of the nineteenth century Idaho was conspicuously a mining State. The census of 1890 gives us this notable fact—that in this Commonwealth, whose entire taxable valuation was $31,000,000, there was produced in a single year more than half that value of lead, silver, and gold. To-day Idaho is a flourishing agricultural State; and it is perhaps in the impetus he gave to her growth along these lines that Senator BRADY made his most important contribution to her welfare. His natural instincts as a farmer, combined with his great and forceful ability as an irrigationist, gave him a broad and ambitious conception of what Idaho might become agriculturally.

Senator BRADY was a constructor, a builder—the very spirit of the practical. At the same time he had a vision, and in the vast development of his great irrigation projects his vision was realized. He indeed caused two blades of grass to grow where but one—nay, perhaps none—grew before.

Senator BRADY brought to the United States Senate the results of a ripe practical experience, coupled with an energy and enthusiasm rarely excelled in our public men.

I first knew Senator BRADY by close association when in 1913 he became a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He promptly took up his work on that great committee with sagacity and diligence, and brought to bear upon its labors that practical mind and sound judgment which soon made him one of the leading figures in the consideration of matters connected with that very important committee. I early came to learn that whenever Senator BRADY expressed an opinion on the committee's deliberations a valuable contribution had been made.

My personal relations with Senator BRADY were always most pleasant. There was a very lovable side to his character, a cheerful courtesy and a kindness of heart which greatly endeared him to those who were permitted to enjoy a more intimate association with him.

One of the most beautiful of Washington's many beautiful homes was that of the late Senator Nixon. After Senator Nixon's death Senator BRADY purchased the Nixon estate and beautified and improved it until it was among the most attractive in Washington. Here Senator BRADY delighted to bring his friends to enjoy that cordial hospitality over which his charming wife presided so graciously.

His colleagues in the Senate have lost a wise counselor and colaborer and a genial friend. An excellent governor has passed on; and in Senator BRADY's death the Nation, as well as Idaho, has suffered an irreparable loss.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, because of the absence of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], on account of illness, I am quite willing to close the services by saying a few words of appreciation of our late colleague, Senator BRADY.

If, as we love to think, the United States excels the older civilization in point of strength and efficiency, it is because of the all-round character of her leading citizens. In the older countries men are prone to live their lives in the places where they were born, surrounded by the traditions and hampered by the prejudices of their native districts.

In the lives of the two Senators whom we have eulogized here to-day we can not fail to be struck by the change and variety that came into their lives. Senator GALLINGER was born in Canada and came to the United States and lived most of his life in New Hampshire. He began as a printer; he became a physician; then a public man and a distinguished Senator. Senator BRADY was born in Pennsylvania and moved westward with the Star of Empire. He taught school; he was a printer; he became a banker and a business man.

As long as the United States of America can produce men of this sort, men who are willing to sacrifice their time and their ease to serve the Nation thoroughly and well, we need not fear for its future.

There was a breeziness and freshness and rugged quality about Senator BRADY that always reminded me of the West, where I myself began life at the age of 17 years.

I was not on any committee with Senator BRADY and I had no close association with him until he became a member of the joint statutory committee of the two Houses with reference to the subject of rural credits. I was surprised to find what a diligent, intelligent, and active man Senator BRADY was on committee work. We were doing our best to handle a very great subject. I came from the East, where I had little hope that the rural credits bill would be of benefit. Senator BRADY came from the West, where he expected it to be of great benefit. I was the more radical of the two and believed more in Government aid than Senator BRADY did. He brought to that work the experience and conservatism of a banker. Wherever we clashed it was the conservative East in the form of a radical against the radical West in the form of a conservative. But we were always able to harmonize our differences and we finally met on common ground and supported the same measure to the end.

I can very earnestly and sincerely pay my tribute to Senator BRADY as one of the finest products of our American civilization that it has ever been my pleasure to meet.

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, January 20, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, January 19, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. CANNON].

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in Heaven, we thank Thee that the deeds of man are automatically recorded in the tissues of his soul, that the final result is the character which he builds for himself.

Some men work to live, others live to work. The former are eye servants. The latter are heroes and work for the betterment of mankind, in the community, the State, the Nation, the world. Such men are admired, respected, and loved by all with whom they come in contact.

We are here to-day in memory of two who have placed themselves on the roll of honor, to record on the pages of history their life, character, and public service; that they may live as beacon lights to guide us and future generations, to emulate their virtues, so that when we pass from this life men will rise up and call us blessed.

They are gone. Their works live. We mourn their going, but look forward with bright anticipations to the life eternal. Let this comfort us and their dear ones until Thou shalt call us to join them in the realms of the larger life where peace and happiness shall reign supreme; and everlasting praise be Thine, through the world's Great Exemplar. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with on this occasion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. CANNON, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, January 19, 1919, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOHN A. STERLING, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

On motion of Mr. BURROUGHS, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, January 19, 1919, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JOHN A. STERLING.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following resolutions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 510.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JOHN A. STERLING, late a Member of this House from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, on October 17 last my colleague, JOHN A. STERLING, Representative from the seventeenth congressional district of Illinois, suddenly departed this life as the result of an automobile accident while on a visit to his home and district, and we, his friends, are gathered here on this occasion to testify to his worth and character.

Congressman STERLING lived only a few moments after the accident occurred, but during that time showed his unselfishness and consideration of others in insisting that his rescuers should go to the aid of those who were with him in the accident and who were not injured as much as himself. While one of them was trying to assist him he said, "Never mind me. Look after the others." And this thoughful expression on his part recalls to my mind the last words of the late President McKinley who in his dying hour was so solicitous of those around him.

JOHN ALLAN STERLING had an eventful career and left a name which will long be remembered, not only by those whom he especially served as Congressman, but also by his State and country at large. He was born on a farm in Leroy, McLean County, Ill. He attended the public schools and was graduated from the Illinois Wesleyan University in the class of 1881. While attending this institution he was a teacher in the public schools and upon his graduation became superintendent of schools in Lexington in an adjoining county.

Subsequently he took up the study of law and was admitted to the bar of Illinois in 1884. He formed a partnership with a classmate of his, Mr. Sain Welty, which continued until his partner was elected judge of the circuit court. Later he organized a firm which was considered one of the ablest in central Illinois, and was in active practice until his death. In 1892 he was elected State attorney for McLean County and held that position for four years. In 1902 he was elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress and was a Member of all the succeeding Congresses, including the present, with the exception of the Sixty-third Congress. During his first term he was a member of the Committees on Territories and Elections. In his second term he was assigned to the Committee on the Judiciary. In the Sixty-fourth Congress he became a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and in the Sixty-fifth Congress a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. He therefore had assignments upon three of the most important, if not the most important committees, of the House of Representatives, and in all those positions he won the confidence of the House and found the opportunity for demonstrating his ability and statesmanship.

He was recognized as one of the leading lawyers of the State. Judge Welty, his former law partner, has said:

> I knew him as no other lawyer in the city (Bloomington) knew him, and I can say that my opinion of his legal ability was always one of admiration. Perhaps there has been no other lawyer in our generation at this bar who undertook his cases with more painstaking care and thoroughness. No case was a trivial one for him. He prepared himself on the law and the facts with an earnestness and sincerity which spared no efforts. As a trial lawyer he had few peers. He impressed the jury with his evident seriousness and belief in the justice of his cause. The Bloomington bar will have reason long to remember JOHN A. STERLING as one of its greatest lights.

I think I can justly say that Congressman STERLING was recognized by this body as one of its ablest lawyers, and he demonstrated it on more than one occasion in the consideration of legal questions. I can recall a number of instances, but one in particular during the impeachment of a Federal judge before the Senate some years ago, when it was remarked by many Senators that his presentation of the case was one of the strongest ever made before that body.

As a man he won the respect of all who came in association with him. He was of modest demeanor, gentle in his manner, considerate of the feelings of others, and unselfish to a marked degree. His was a kindly nature which radiated and permeated those around him. He was a man who did not seek the limelight, nor was he always forcing himself to the front, but one whose ability commanded attention and was so evident that many eagerly sought his advice and gave due recognition to his worth.

He was a man who did not give his confidence to everyone, but only upon long acquaintance and close association. He was slow in forming his opinions and after study and consideration came to a conclusion which was marked by deep thought, keen perception, and steadfastness of purpose; and when he arrived at that conclusion he was unshaken, but with great sincerity, born of conviction, he impressed it upon the minds of those around him. Having once taken his position on any question he was firm as a rock to the cause which he advocated, and nothing could move him from his position. He was naturally conservative in thought and action. He was no demagogue, nor did he appeal to the galleries, nor was he striving for headlines in the public press. He had contempt for the superficial and sensational which seeks publicity simply for the sake of it and gives the impression to the people of a character which does not exist. Reputation and character are two different things—reputation is what the world thinks of you and character is what you really are. JOHN STERLING never sought reputation, but he established a character of such breadth and power as will be known and revered for years to come.

His distinguishing characteristic might be said to be that of intense sincerity—sincerity in thought, in action, and in purpose. There was nothing of duplicity in him. He was never found sitting on the fence—he was either on one side or the other. He never tried to ride two horses. He never gave his support to a man or a cause but what he was true to the end. He was at all times what his name expressed—sterling—and on this account gripped his friends with bands of steel. He was one of the manliest, truest, gentlest, noblest men I ever knew.

Every position that he held in life he filled with ability, courage, and honor, and there is no office in the gift of the American people to which he might have been called if he had lived which he could not have filled with signal distinction. He would have made an able governor, a distinguished Senator, a splendid Speaker of this House, and the great interests of our Nation could have been safely entrusted in his hands as its President.

We mourn him to-day as our colleague and associate, one of the ablest Representatives that Illinois ever sent to this body, a great lawyer, a wise counselor, a true patriot and statesman, and we extend out heartfelt sympathy to those who knew him better than we, in the holiest of all circles, around the fireside and in the home.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, the State of Illinois has long recognized the fact that in honoring its faithful Representatives by giving them length of service it promotes its own well-being. There are present here to-day conspicuous examples of this on both sides of the House. First of all on the roll of long service comes JOSEPH GURNEY CANNON, Nestor of legislators, with an unrivaled record, having to his credit the greatest length of service of any man who ever sat in either House, and probably the most experienced legislator in the whole world; who practiced law when Lincoln was district attorney of Sangamon County, Ill., who heard the Lincoln-Douglas debates in 1858, and who began his national career in 1860 as a delegate to the convention at Chicago that nominated Lincoln for the Presidency.

Next in length of service from Illinois in this House comes JAMES R. MANN, with eleven continuous terms to his credit; then GEORGE E. FOSS, also with eleven terms; then HENRY T. RAINEY, with eight terms, and WILLIAM A. RODENBERG, with a like number; MARTIN B. MADDEN, CHARLES E. FULLER, and WILLIAM W. WILSON, with seven terms each. And our dead brother JOHN A. STERLING, whose memory we honor to-day, was also seven times elected a Member of the House. If he had served here only a term or two neither we nor the country would have known how great a man he was for his qualities were of the kind that time alone can exhibit in their full degree. He came here with the learning of the schoolmaster and the experience of the State's attorney; but he was a quiet man, and in his first session here did not take any part in the debates on the floor of the House; and as no committees were appointed in that session except the two or three that had to do with the special business for which the session was called, we did not have the usual chance to measure him across the committee table. In the second session he was appointed a member of the Committee on Elections No. 3 and the Committee on the Territories; and the first public word he said was in a contested election case. The first sentence he ever spoke on this floor was eminently characteristic of the man. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this discussion ought to be confined to the questions that are made in this record. The remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa have not been based to any extent upon the record that was before this committee and is now before this House. I can not understand what the platform which the gentleman read has to do with the question that this House has to decide.

That remark was typical of the processes of Mr. STERLING'S mind. He could not understand why anyone should ever seek to becloud a question or sidestep a duty. When he had studied a question and had made up his mind what ought to be done, there was for him only one thing to do, and that was to go where his judgment and conscience led and go by the shortest possible route. He was a man of strong friendships, but he never let a personal friendship interfere with his judgment in the discharge of his duty or with the process by which he made up his mind that one side of a question was right and the other side was wrong. Over and over again, in his speeches in this House, he urged Members not to be swayed by sympathy or prejudice or by the consideration of outside matters. To him every question was a simple one, because he first stripped it of all the husks, he cracked the shell, and when he had finished his statement of a question there was nothing left except the one plain thing to be decided. He did not speak often, but when he did he threw a searchlight on the subject.

This being the quality of the man, it was inevitable that he should grow in the esteem of his fellow Members; and the longer he was here the more important were the duties placed on his shoulders. His services on the Elections Committee proved him to be a strong lawyer; and naturally enough he had not been here long before he was chosen a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, in which capacity he did some of his best work. Then he was selected to serve on the Committtee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, taking an active part in the enormous tasks that have confronted that committee; and finally he became a member of the great Committee on Ways and Means. No committtee of Congress has ever had before it such important matters as have come before this committee in recent years. And in this work Mr. STERLING took an increasingly conspicuous part. He was a strong believer in the doctrine of the protection of the industries of this country from the attacks of competitors who by cheap labor would destroy the comfort of the American workman's home; and in his speeches and in the committee he never let anyone have a moment's doubt as to where he stood on that subject. He was for his country always. Such men make a nation invincible. He was strong, he thought in a straight line, he was loyal to his friends and to his duty. He hated claptrap of every kind, and he left this House and this country better for having served here with us.

The treasure of a husband's or a wife's affection, like the grace of God, is given—not bought. Gold it powerful. It can sweep down forests, raise cities, build great structures, and decorate and beautify homes. It can collect armies, and inspire awe and fear, but wealth can not purchase love.

If any one has failed to estimate the affection of a true-hearted husband or a wife they will be likely to discover the value in the loss—when that heart that loved them is stilled by death.

Death comes to us all—no sex is spared, no age exempt, the black and the white, the rich and the poor, the weak and the strong—all must die.

No matter what may be our station in this life we must die, and when death comes to us all men are equal. As in the chess-play, so long as the game is playing, all the men stand in their rank or order, and are respected according to their places—first the king, then the queen, then the bishops, then the knights, and last of all the common soldiers. But when once the game is ended they are all tumbled into a bag, and often the king is lowest and the common soldier uppermost. So it is with us in this life. The world is a huge theater or stage wherein some play the part of a king, some a bishop, another that of a humble citizen, but death sends them all alike to the grave. Death comes equally to us all, and makes us all equal when it comes. Such is life.

JOHN A. STERLING was of sterling character, a fond and loving father and husband, a valuable addition to any community. He lived a good life, fought the battle honorably and nobly. He left behind him a loving wife and affectionate children and an army of friends. Let us ever pray that his soul may rest in peace.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, we are assembled here to-day for the purpose of doing honor to the memory of our friend and colleague. It is difficult for those of us who knew JOHN A. STERLING best to realize that he has left the places which knew him here and has sailed away over the mystic sea to an unknown shore. May we not hope that he has gone to meet those of his friends who have made the journey ahead of him. He was a strong, forceful, manly man of action, discharging in all the emergencies of this life his full duty. He served upon the great committees of this House during his nearly 14 years of service here. It is difficult to realize that this historic Chamber, which has echoed so often to his forceful oratory, will know him no more. I was particularly associated with him during the entire period of his service here, although we sat on opposite sides of this aisle. We were affiliated always with parties which stood upon different political platforms, but I have never known partisanship to interfere in any way with his ideals of duty.

His counsel was sought always by the leaders of the Nation. During his public career it can be said of him that he walked with the great of his country, but he never for one moment forgot the common touch. His sympathies were of that broad and generous character which kept him during his career closely in touch with the people of the State he represented here and the great common people of this Nation. During the latter part of his service here he served on the great Ways and Means Committee of the House, and during the long hours of every workday on that committee, while engaged in the preparation of the greatest revenue bills ever submitted to any Congress, he sat at the table performing his full share of the labor honestly and conscientiously, at all times living up to his high ideals. His life was never a life of mere ease or pleasure, but always a life of hard work, the hardest kind of work, and the victory he sought was the reward which comes after the most exacting mental labor.

In the prime of life, when for him the sun was still high in the heavens, with his mental and his physical powers unimpaired, he passed suddenly away from this earth through the shadows to the sunshine of the life which awaited him beyond the grave. He will be missed in the community where he lived. He will be missed as few men are missed in the great State he served here so long, so faithfully, and so well, and he will be missed by those of us who were associated with him in his work here during all the remaining years which are ours upon this earth. A manly man has gone.

The manly man is the country's need, and the moment's need, forsooth,
With a heart that beats to the pulsing tread of the allied leagues of truth;
The world is his, and it waits for him, and it leaps to hear the ring
Of the blows he strikes and the wheels he turns and the hammer he dares to swing;
It likes the forward look in his face, the poise of his noble head,
And the onward lunge of his tireless will and the sweep of his dauntless tread.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, at this moment I hardly feel I can do the subject justice. There was about JOHN STERLING something that once having learned we could never forget. My colleague [Mr. Foss], I think, suggested how appropriate was his name, for if in my long career I have met one man who was truly sterling in all of the things that make for character it was our colleague JOHN STERLING, in whose honor we are here to-day. He was a quiet man. I was told some years ago that he was a man who lacked a sense of humor but after acquaintance with him I found that he had that priceless jewel of a love of fun and humor that did not display itself as it does with most of us, but he loved the quaint, the curious, and the ridiculous as a part of his mental exercises, although only those who knew him well appreciated that particular characteristic.

He was one of the most reliable and the most "unafraid" of our associates here in Washington. We used to call him the "Old Reliable" because we knew when we went to him for advice he would not follow the old suggestion that, when you are asked to give advice, always find out what is needed and then give it to them.

JOHN STERLING had the courage to talk squarely with his friends, and he gave no advice to please those with whom he was advising. I have never known him in all of his career to vote or play the part of a coward or a demagogue. He had analyzed to himself, had satisfied his own conscience, that this was the right vote to give, and he gave it, being prepared to take the consequences, whatever they might be.

He was unafraid in the trial of a case. I have been told by men who tried cases with him that he learned the great knack of being able to "fight without quarreling." He stood by his clients at the bar without quarreling with the other members of the bar with whom he was in contest.

He gave his votes here, and, as my colleague from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has said, he fought for those principles he believed in; but in his fighting, as my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] has said, he was big enough to fight but too big to quarrel.

I have chosen, Mr. Speaker, to read a few words that were delivered by Col. Ingersoll at the grave of his brother:

The loved and loving brother, husband, father, friend, died where manhood's morning almost touches noon and while the shadows still were falling toward the West. He had not passed on life's highway the stone that marks the highest point, but being weary for a moment he laid down by the wayside, and, using his burden for a pillow, fell into that dreamless sleep that kisses down his eyelids still. While yet in love with life and raptured with the world, he passed to silence and pathetic dust. Yet, after all, it may be best, just in the happiest, sunniest hour of all the voyage, while eager winds are kissing every sail, to dash against the unseen rock, and in an instant hear the billows roar a sunken ship. For, whether in mid-sea or among the breakers of the farther shore, a wreck must mark at last the end of each and all. And every life, no matter if its every hour is rich with love and every moment jeweled with a joy, will, at its close, become a tragedy as sad and deep and dark as can be woven of warp and woof of mystery and death.

This brave and tender man in every storm of life was oak and rock, but in the sunshine he was vine and flower. He was the friend of all heroic souls. He climbed the heights and left all superstitions far below, while on his forehead fell the golden dawning of a grander day. He loved the beautiful, and was with color, form, and music touched to tears. He sided with the weak, and with a willing hand gave alms; with loyal heart and with the purest hand he faithfully discharged all public trusts. He was a worshipper of liberty and a friend of the oppressed. A thousand times I have heard him quote the words, "For justice all place a temple and all season summer." He believed that happiness was the only good, reason the only touch, justice the only worshipper, humanity the only religion, and love the priest.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we do not agree with Col. Ingersoll that "Life is a barren vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities." Of course, every man who has had one friend, who has had one woman to love him, and children to caress him, does not agree with Col. Ingersoll that "Life is a barren plane," but a plane with barren spots; but the oasis comes whenever we meet a friend and find an opportunity to be of use and service.

We strive in vain—

Says Col. Ingersoll—

to look beyond the heights. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead there comes no word; but in the night of death hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing.

We can say of JOHN STERLING that there was no gentler, stronger, manlier man.

Mr. Speaker, I know at times, and sometimes on occasions of this kind, we dwell upon the things hoped for. Putting aside all other questions and using only that means that logic gives to us, is not the hope of the immortal life a reasonable hope? Nothing can be destroyed in the workshop of God. Though we burn the book, it is not destroyed. Everything that went to make this book is still in existence. The form of JOHN STERLING, silent, cold, returns to dust, yet everything that went to make his physical body is still in the workshop of God Almighty, for He is jealous of those things that come from His hand. And if it is true, and we know it is true, that no thing that we can understand with the human mind can be destroyed, can it be possible that unselfish love—can it be possible that character, industry, love of service, patriotism, all of those things that went to make a manly man like JOHN STERLING, are to be lost and blown out like the candle, while the meaner things, the dust and the ashes, are saved?

Oh, Mr. Speaker, the faith is a reasonable faith, and in contemplating that we find a poverty of words. We can only know when we reach the rapt and hopeful thought that unselfish love can not die, that words can not picture what our faith calls for and, finding the poverty of words, we say with Father Ryan:

Far out on the sea there are billows that never will break on the beach.
I have heard songs in the silence that never will float into speech.
And I have dreamed dreams in the valley too lofty for language to reach.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the untimely death of the late Hon. JOHN STERLING, of Illinois, is a distinct loss to his district, his State, and the Nation. He was taken off in the prime of his manhood and in the full ripeness of his congressional career. I was housed with him in the same hotel during his entire service and knew him as well as any Member outside his home State. As a lawyer he ranked high, and his industry, his ability, his integrity, and fidelity to every trust gave him a status the equal of any Member from any State in this historic Chamber. His sketch in the Congressional Directory is brief and unpretentious. We have never had in this country too many men of heart and brains and morals and courage in public life, and at no period in our history have men of this type been more needed than now. No time in our history has there ever been a more urgent demand for just men of courage, patriotism, and ability on the floor of Congress.

It was our own poet of patriotism, Fitz-Greene Halleck, who wrote, in Marco Bozzaris, this pathetic and heartrending couplet:

Come to the bridal chamber, Death!
Come to the mother when she feels
For the first time her first-born's breath!
And thou art terrible!

But more terrible is the loss of a fully equipped man, mentally and morally, because his loss is not only to the family, the wife, the children, but to the State. The one loss to the other is as the rosebud compared with the full-blown rose, grown fragrant and beautiful in God's sunshine. And the example of a well-rounded man, of power and influence for the good of his fellowman, does not attach to the newborn child.

One of the greatest of Athenian philosophers said:

Most of all, fellow citizens, if your sons ask whose example they shall imitate, what will you say? For you know well it is not the music, nor the gymnasium, nor the schools that mold young men. It is much more—the public proclamation, the public example. If you take one whose life has no high purpose and crown him in the theater, every boy who sees it is corrupted. Beware, therefore, Athenians, remembering posterity will rejudge your judgment and that the character of a city is determined by the character of the men it crowns.

Two thousand years have elapsed since this classic was uttered, and it is still vital and valuable. The hope and ambition of our young men of to-day is fostered and fed by the character of the men the people of this Republic send into our highest legislative body. Mr. STERLING's example is a potent teacher to the young men of his district and his State. Example teaches without a tongue. It is silent, but its action for good is more forcible than words, however eloquent. Mr. STERLING has left no enemy on either side of this House. His life, his character, his career will always be a grateful memory to his family, his kindred, and his colleagues.

It is not the length of years that we live or the length of our service on this floor that measures our value to our constituents and the country. Mr. STERLING lived 61 years and served almost 14 years in Congress, or nine years longer than the average official life of a Congressman. In the 50 years following the great Civil War the average official life was less than six years.

While Mr. STERLING had before him many more years of valuable service in the ordinary contingencies of human life, he lived long enough to make an enduring record of valuable service and achieve an honorable name. He has left to his family, his kindred, and his State a record of achievements that should fill their hearts with pride and mellow the acute sorrow over his untimely death. And there is a deeper consolation, told with so much pathos by Longfellow:

There is no death; what seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call death.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, when JOHN A. STERLING passed to the great beyond this Nation lost a man of immeasurable value at a time when his services were most needed.

He was not given to making a brilliant and startling display of his genius, but he was practical, level-headed, and wise on all questions pertaining to the Nation's welfare.

Illinois has lost one of its most capable Representatives. So highly was he esteemed by the people of our State had he lived he would undoubtedly have been called to higher honors.

As his friend I sustained a great personal loss. His quiet gentleness of manner, his unfailing courtesy, and his thoughtfulness remained with him to the end, and his last words and his last acts were for the comfort of his companions who were injured. For he in his last moments said: "Take care of the others first"; and while they were receiving attention his soul returned to his God.

Although he has gone, his memory lives, an inspiration to all who knew and loved him. May his example inspire us to emulate his kind, manly spirit!

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, any words that I may be able to utter will, of course, be inadequate to express the feeling that I have with respect to our deceased colleague. JOHN STERLING was among America's most conspicuous men. His life and work were such as not only to attract men to him, but to attract the confidence of the country in the man.

His most conspicuous public service here, as I believe, was his prosecution of Judge Archbold, who was impeached for misdemeanors in office. His presentation of that case before the Senate of the United States was said to be the clearest, most forceful legal argument that has ever been made by any lawyer in any case in America. His action in this case called him specially to the attention of the Nation, and it established for JOHN STERLING a national reputation as a lawyer which no other act could have brought to him. Every man in the case, those who were opposed to the prosecution and those who were for the prosecution, admitted that JOHN STERLING knew more about the law in the case and presented the ablest arguments in the case of any man connected with the case, and in my opinion, as a matter of fact, it was his untiring work in delving into the facts and the law which enabled the country to rid itself of Judge Archbold.

JOHN STERLING served his country in what I believe to be the most momentous period of its history. He was here when the great war began in Europe. He was here during all the period of the formation of public opinion in America in connection with that war. He was here at the time when men's souls were tried, when their patriotism was tested, when men were proved either to be American or otherwise by their actions. There never was any doubt about JOHN STERLING'S Americanism or patriotism. He was an American through and through. He believed in preserving every right of his country, in the preservation of the national honor, in the perpetuity of the Nation's institutions, and he not only stood for a declaration of war against Germany, but when war was declared he gave his son in defense of the flag. He was not only a patriot himself, and proved that by his own actions, but he was proud that he had a son that could be given to defend the institutions of his country.

He was a courageous man. He was modest. He was unassuming. But he never lacked the courage of his convictions. I recall on one occasion here, when the Clayton antitrust law was under consideration, he as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary stood boldly for American rights, for one citizenship, for one flag, for one code of laws, for the principle that every man should stand equal before the law. He displayed a courage during the consideration of that bill that few men on this floor displayed. He not only displayed courage, but he displayed knowledge of the pending legislation which no other man on the floor possessed.

JOHN STERLING was quiet and unassuming, but his friendship was something to be sought. Once attained, you might be certain, if you justified it, to continue to retain it. He lived a life of great usefulness. His life can well be emulated by the children of the generations yet to come. The things that JOHN STERLING did during life will continue to live, now that he is gone. Men like JOHN STERLING do not die. Their work continues to keep them before the minds of the youth that follow. Though we all regret to miss him in our daily contact in life, yet we are proud that the Nation gave JOHN STERLING to his country, and that during his public service he gave to the country the best there was in him.

His family, of course, will miss daily contact with him. They will mourn his death. But they will have the consciousness that some day they, too, will pass beyond and meet him under better circumstances; for we who believe in a future must continue to hope that the end of life here is not the end of our association with those we love. And while we may mourn and sympathize with the family of JOHN STERLING, yet, after all, death is just as natural as life; and while we rejoice at life and birth, and mourn at death, there is no reason why mourning should exist on account of our passing away. For one I simply wish to express my pride and my joy that JOHN STERLING'S life was one in the whole, I may say, given to the Nation while he lived, and what he did and what he said will continue to live; and I am happy in the thought that we who associated with him during life may hope to associate with him again when we reach the other side.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I did not know Hon. JOHN A. STERLING personally until I came here as a Member of the present Congress, although I knew of him by reputation in my State. In Illinois there were but few who had any knowledge of public affairs who did not know of his public life and works and who did not highly regard him. While I, by the short period of my service here, was not able to judge of the worth of JOHN A. STERLING as others who speak here, men who have served with him for years, yet I did form a lasting impression of him from observing him and his work as a Representative. I presume the new Member, who sits through the sessions with but few other duties to perform except to observe the proceedings, forms a more vivid impression of the men who carry on the important work of the House than do those who have been for years associated with these men. I observed early that when JOHN A. STERLING spoke on any subject he had an attentive and thoughtful audience. I observed that those who spoke of him spoke of him as a sincere man and a plain, logical, and exact thinker.

He was extremely considerate of the opinions of others and was willing to listen at all times to the suggestions of any Member, whether he was of years of experience or of few days in the public service. So far as I could observe, there was no division of sentiment among the Members of his own delegation as to his superlative ability as a legislator and a man, and I have no doubt this was the common feeling of the Members of the House, irrespective of party.

I was not in the country when JOHN A. STERLING died. I did not know of the fact until I returned to this country. Immediately upon my return I saw an American paper, and in this paper observed a mention of the late Representative JOHN A. STERLING, from Illinois. I can not express to you the distinct shock this was to me. I had come to regard my colleague, Mr. STERLING, as an institution, almost, and to find that he, with his wonderful mind, was gone was almost inconceivable. In this time of great questions and when world problems are being solved we needed men like JOHN A. STERLING, men of logical minds, minds that drive through the fog and straight to their objects, minds that disregard the chaff and seek only the wheat that is the harvest.

There is to-day so much of uncertainty, so much to perplex those who must legislate for the country, and there are so few minds that process regularly in times of mighty stress and emotion, that to lose one of these minds is a distinct and positive loss to mankind. Such a mind, and such a personality, my colleagues, we have lost.

There is not much of intimate knowledge that I can say of our departed colleague, for I was not his intimate friend. But I do want to pay my humble tribute, now and here, to the memory of this man from my State. We have had few of his kind. In his life he honored his own State of Illinois, dignified the House of Representatives in which he served, and was a credit to the country which he loved so well.

But the good things JOHN A. STERLING did will not die. May we not rather agree with the poet:

I shot an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For, so swiftly it flew, the sight
Could not follow it in its flight.

I breathed a song into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For who has sight so keen and strong,
That it can follow the flight of song?

Long, long afterward, in an oak,
I found the arrow, still unbroke;
And the song, from beginning to end,
I found again in the heart of a friend.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, no one could know JOHN A. STERLING without feeling that his growth here was remarkable for its strength, its simplicity, and its rounded character. Some men who come here are not so strong afterwards as when they first came, but any man who works hard must grow. The danger is that he may grow in one direction, to be a politician, to excel in the tricks of the trade, or in mere tricks of oratory, and to put success above the principles upon which it should be founded. It is hard here in all the changes and chances of politics to remain absolutely simple, absolutely true, and strong enough to be willing when the occasion comes to speak your mind as you think you ought to speak it. But such a man was JOHN A. STERLING. He grew like an oak in all directions, the roots reaching out constantly into more knowledge and the branches sturdily meeting and breasting any wind or any storm. He grew because as a lawyer and statesman his opinions and actions were founded on a wonderful common sense, upon a wonderful knowledge of the common law, and upon a most uncommon honesty and absolute courage.

I knew him best in the Sixty-first Congress. We had served together on the Committee on the Judiciary, but in that particular Congress I had the privilege of putting him at the head of a subcommittee that was practically a committee; we then for the first time divided the work of the Committee on the Judiciary between three great subcommittees so that one took bills relating to law, another took bills relating to practice, while all the difficult bills as to organization of the courts, when there shall be new judges, what shape the courts shall take in each particular district and their constitutions, were referred to one of these great subcommittees of seven members which was presided over by JOHN A. STERLING; all these matters were in his hands. And I feel it my duty to speak for the courage, the sense of justice, and the considerateness with which these difficult questions were arranged and settled by him during those two years.

I have but one other matter to call to the remembrance of the House. It was only recently that the Committee on Ways and Means reported and passed a great bill for raising revenue. It took new lines. It went upon the lines of taking wealth wherever you could find it. We all voted for it, because we are meeting the greatest emergency that this country has ever met in all the centuries, but JOHN A. STERLING, in his quiet, considerate, and therefore absolutely inoffensive way, while supporting that bill, had the courage upon this floor to say he would have preferred a bill which would have been more even and just to all. His proposition was that a single per cent of tax placed upon every sale that was made in this country would have brought in some three billions of dollars. I do not mention this as a matter of discussion. I do mention it as showing the absolute independence, the courage, and justice of the man. He sought always what was right. He was not afraid to say what he thought, no matter how much that might be misrepresented.

We have lost a friend. A tree can not be torn up that has put out its roots in every direction, that has thrown out its branches under the shade of which we have sat—a tree that has intertwined itself with our lives—that sort of a man can not be lost without a wrench that is hard and makes it seem almost unfair and wrong to analyze the character, but in this case no analysis can do harm, for there is not one of us who could put his finger upon anything that was petty or mean in his character.

At this point Mr. WALSH assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, there are some Members who are unavoidably absent and some present who have been unable to prepare tributes to the memory of Mr. STERLING. Therefore, on behalf of them I ask unanimous consent that permission may be granted to them to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution setting aside a time for tributes to the memory of Senator GALLINGER.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. BURROUGHS, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That Sunday, January 19, 1919, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, late a Senator from the State of New Hampshire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON].

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 508.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, late a Senator of the United States from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON] is recognized.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues is very anxious to get away, and I will yield the first place to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and follow him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, there is a world of meaning in that fine old Greek word "eulogy"—the speaking of good words about a man. For years we see him going about his daily duties, performing them with honor to himself and benefit to those whom he serves. We say little or nothing about it, though the consciousness of his presence and his work may be in our minds every day. Then there comes a time when his place is vacant, and we realize what he then was by what he now is not. It is fitting that, before we ourselves are gone, we put in enduring words, so that as long as ink and paper last men may read, our estimate and appreciation of our distinguished fellow servant, who, when he died, was the oldest Member in service in the Senate.

JACOB H. GALLINGER was one of the adopted sons of this Republic, coming to us, like the late Senator McMillan of Michigan, from our sister commonwealth of Canada. It is a curious coincidence that these two great men, who have done more than almost any others to beautify this city of Washington, were both born in that friendly country at our north. Each of them served for many years as chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, and each believed that, as Congress is the special guardian of the District, it should be cared for and developed as befits the Capitat of the greatest nation on earth.

Canada has sent many of her sons to the United States. Though born under a so-called monarchy, their ideas of self-government are the same as ours. The majestic forests and shining lakes of Canada are like those of our own Northern States, and the people of both nations breathe the same glorious air of liberty, and both have the same love and respect for law and order. Our boys and theirs have fought side by side in France for the preservation of civilization. Boston is as much the metropolis of eastern Canada as it is of New England. The pine of Michigan was largely cut by the sons of Ontario and New Brunswick and Quebec. Thousands of farmers of Iowa and the Dakotas have sought homes in the valleys of the Saskatchewan. And the names of James McMillan of Michigan and JACOB H. GALLINGER of New Hampshire, conspicuous on the roll of the United States Senate, are proof, if proof were needed, that the frontier between Canada and our own country is scarcely more a separation of common aims and purposes than are the boundaries between our own States.

The greatest danger that confronts the world at this moment is not imperialism, but the horrid irresponsibility that sometimes sneaks under the name of the I. W. W., but now is sweeping through unhappy Russia and defeated Germany under the name of the Bolsheviki. The English-speaking race is and will always be the bulwark of the world against anarchy in every form; and in the contests of the future, Canada and the United States will stand side by side solidly against all movements that threaten the safety of society, as so many of her sons stand shoulder to shoulder with us in all the varied interests and activities of modern life.

Others have told the House of the wonderful versatility and industry of Senator GALLINGER in the affairs of his adopted State and of the Nation and in international affairs. He was eminent in his profession, that of medicine, before a public career claimed his time completely. To enumerate even the titles of the different public positions he held would take too long.

He was one of the leaders of his State, of his party, and of his time. Here in Washington he was known as a man who appreciated the needs of the city, and recognized that it is the Capital of our beloved country, wholly dependent upon and at the mercy of Congress, therefore to be protected and developed and beautified as befits the dignity of the great people of whose government it is the official home. It is interesting to see what was the incident that caused Senator GALLINGER to begin to show a friendly interest in District of Columbia affairs. During his first senatorial term, in 1891, he received a letter from the secretary of Harvard College, voicing a complaint that the high schools of the District were not then able to prepare students to pass the admission examination to Harvard. Senator GALLINGER offered a resolution of inquiry concerning the matter, and that was the beginning of nearly 30 years of championship of the rights of the District. At that time Senator McMillan was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but on his death Mr. GALLINGER was chosen by the Senate for that position.

In 1911 a banquet was given by citizens of the District at which Senator GALLINGER was the guest of honor, and he was there presented with a loving cup by the Chamber of Commerce; a gold watch and chain from the Board of Trade; a basket of American Beauty roses from the teachers of the public schools; a silver pitcher from the Plate Printers' Union; and a silver desk set from the American Civic Association. Among the visible monuments of his chairmanship are the great Washington Terminal, the filtration plant which gives clear water to this city, the new sewer system, the District Building, the highway Potomac River Bridge, the beautiful Connecticut Avenue Bridge, the Anacostia Bridge, the Massachusetts Avenue Bridge, and great developments of the parks and schools, among the latter the Business High and McKinley Manual Training Schools; and there are even more important tangible benefits that are the results of his tireless interest. At that dinner President Taft was one of the speakers, and this brief tribute can not be concluded better than by a quotation from his remarks on that occasion. He said:

There is a class of legislators who favor legislation because of the good that it is going to do when it is enforced, and there is another class who are in favor of legislation wholly without regard to what it is going to accomplish as an enforced law, but who take an interest simply because of the votes that the advocacy of the law is going to give them. Now Senator GALLINGER belongs to the former class.

They have in New England what they call safe men. By that they mean men who, from their youth up, feel charged with the responsibility of looking out for the community in which they live; first the village, then the town, then it may be the county, then the State, and finally the Nation. They seem to be able by what they do to impress the people with the idea that if they are given a public trust they will regard it as a trust for the people, and can themselves be trusted as safe men for the people to put in power. Now that is the kind of man that Senator GALLINGER is, and that is the reason for his hold on the State of New Hampshire.

Senator GALLINGER started in life as a poor boy, spending some time as a typesetter in a printing office. He finally obtained an education and then rose to the high position occupied so long by him—abundant proof of the worth of the man. Those who knew him best loved him best. He was courageous; he was honest; he was a true gentleman.

When you have found a man, you have found a gentleman. A gentleman is a man who is gentle. Titles, graceful accomplishments, superior culture, princely wealth, great talents, genius, do not constitute a man with sufficient attributes to make a gentleman. He may be awkward, angular, homely, or poor, and yet belong to that class known as gentleman. His face may be bronzed, his hand may be huge and hard, his vest patched, like Joseph's coat of many colors, and he may still be a true gentleman. The dandy is a dry-goods sign, and not a gentleman, for he depends upon dress, and not upon his honor and virtue, to carry him into society. The man who has no money is poor; he who has nothing but money is poorer, and he is not a gentleman.

A gentleman is careful to have thoughts and sentiments worthy of him, as virtue raises the dignity of a man, while vice degrades him. True greatness lies in the heart; it must be elevated by aspiring to great things. Others may attract us through the splendor of some special faculty, or the eminence of some special virtue; but in a gentleman it is the whole individual we admire and love. A true gentleman is one whose nature has been fashioned after the highest models. His qualities depend, not upon fashion or manners, but upon moral worth—not upon personal possessions, but upon personal qualities.

A true gentleman has a keen sense of honor. His standard of probity in word and action is high. He does not shuffle or prevaricate, dodge or skulk; but he is honest, upright, and straightforward. When he says Yes, it is a law; and he dares to say the valiant No at the fitting season. A gentleman will not be bribed; only the low-minded and unprincipled will sell themselves to those who are interested in buying them.

The poor boy may be a true gentleman—in spirit and in daily life. He may be honest, truthful, upright, polite, courageous, self-respecting, and self-helping—that is, be a true gentleman. Such was Senator GALLINGER.

A man's mental powers must be cultivated. The full measure of all the powers necessary to make a man are no more character than a handful of seeds is an orchard of fruits. Plant the seeds and tend them well, and they will make an orchard. Cultivate the powers and harmonize them well, and they will make a noble character. "The germ is not the tree, the acorn is not the oak, neither is the mind a character. The mind is the garden, the character is the fruit; the mind is the white page, the character is the writing we put upon it; the mind is the shop, the counting room, the character is the profits on the trade. Large profits are made from quick sales and small percentages; so great character is made from many little acts and efforts." A dollar is composed of a thousand mills; so is a character composed of a thousand thoughts and acts. Character is formed by a course of actions, and not actions by character. A person can have no character before he has had actions. Though an action be ever so glorious in itself, it ought not to pass for great if it be not the effect of wisdom and good design. Great actions carry their glory with them as the ruby wears its colors. Whatever be your condition, keep in view the whole of your existence. Senator GALLINGER was a man of Character—a Christian man. He was a brave man; he was powerful; he had the courage of convictions and to express them at all times.

Frail man comes into the world crying, cries on through life, and is always seeking after some desired thing which he imagines is labeled happiness or is mourning over some loss which makes him miserable; a restless mortal with an immortal soul, which requires something more than earth can give to satisfy its lofty desires; a soul that hails death as a welcome messenger to deliver it from its ever-changing, ever-decaying prison house of clay, called man, on which time wages a perpetual war; whitening his locks, furrowing his cheeks, stealing his ivory, paralyzing his muscles, poisoning his blood, battering his whole citadel, deranging the whole machinery of his life, and wasting his mental powers, until he becomes twice a child, and then delivers him over to his last and best friend, death, who breaks the carnal bondage, sets the spirit free, opening the door of immortal happiness, returning the soul to its own original and glorious home, to go no more out forever.

We at death leave one place to go to another; if godly, we depart from our place here on earth and go to our place in heaven; we depart from our friends on earth and go to our friends in heaven; we depart from the valley of tears and go to the mount of joy; we depart from the business of life here and go to a heavenly paradise. Who would be unwilling to exchange a Sodom for a Zion? Who would be unwilling to exchange misery for a haven of rest?

When these hands of ours shall be pulseless and cold and motionless as the grave wherein they lie; when the damp, dewy vapors shall replace this sensible, warm motion, and death shall spread our couch and weave our shrouds; when the winding sheet shall be our sole vesture, and the close-sealed sepulcher our only home, and we shall have no familiar companions, no rejoicing friends, let us hope that our souls may recline in the bosom of God.

Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not "Good night," but in some brighter clime
Bid me "Good morning."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, in the present Congress the Grim Reaper has been wielding his scythe with relentless vigor. He has been impartial, too, in choosing his victims. Youth and old age alike have succumbed to his irresistible stroke.

Among those who have fallen none was more highly esteemed by his associates than the lamented Senator from New Hampshire, JACOB H. GALLINGER. He had served his country long and faithfully in the House as well as in the Senate. He was one of the old school of statesmen in public life. He was a thoroughgoing partisan. But he was always impartial and fair and just even in his partisanship. Above all else, he was a thoroughgoing American who loved his country with patriotic devotion. He did not believe that he was stronger nor better than his party. To him party creed demanded that all differences as to policies should be thrashed out in the party council. Therein again he showed himself as belonging to the old school. He did not believe in that course, so often followed by some latter-day politicians, of fighting his party associates and denouncing the party organization because an overwhelming majority of his associates did not come to his way of thinking. He always was ready to compromise differences within the ranks and in the fold rather than engage in party quarrels. He realized that our Government had grown strong and great by reason of the readiness of the leaders of the past to compromise their differences.

He knew that this Government from the first has developed as a great Nation because men of patriotism and loyalty and devotion to the cause of the Republic have been willing to modify their personal views in order that all could agree on the policies to be followed for the welfare of this American Commonwealth. He knew that it was thus in the Constitutional Convention that framed our historic fundamental law. He knew that it was thus with reference to the location of this very Capital, which he as chairman of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia did so much to improve and beautify. He knew that it was thus down the long years of the formative period of our country's history. Senator GALLINGER was loyal to these traditions of the past, and we honor him for his sturdy stand on the great questions that arose during the many years he was a Member of the Senate of the United States.

At the time he entered that historic body there were many old customs that marked the relationship between Members of the House and the Senate that seem to have fallen into innocuous desuetude. It was customary in the old days for the Senators to leave their cards upon the desks of the Members of the House from their respective States on the opening day of the new session. It was customary for the Members of the House to call personally upon the President of the United States and the Senators from their State as soon as possible after arriving in Washington in order to pay their respects.

It was customary even among the wives of the Members of Congress for the new Members' wives to call upon the wives of all the Members who had served longer in Congress than their own husbands, and especially was this true with regard to the wives of the Members from one's own State. These little social amenities and courtesies added something of pleasure to the dull routine of congressional life here in Washington, but these customs are rapidly disappearing. In fact, they had disappeared almost entirely in the closing years of Senator GALLINGER's life. Whether the Capital or the country has gained by breaking away from the old forms and traditions I do not know, but the fact remains that in the old days Republicans and Democrats were much more apt to see something of each other's social side than they do under present-day conditions.

Senator GALLINGER, toward the close of his life, suffered many hard blows at the hands of fate. Many of his dear ones were removed from him by death. I lived at the same hotel as he when some of these blows fell. I know how deeply his life was affected by the losses he sustained. But he toiled on unceasingly for the welfare of his country.

He participated actively in all the important legislation that has been written on the statute books of our country in the last quarter of a century. But he was especially interested in the rehabilitation of our merchant marine. Coming from New Hampshire, he doubtlessly remembered how the enormous fleet of New England clipper ships carried the American flag into almost every important port on the seven seas. He remembered how they had built up the commerce of the United States in the first half of the nineteenth century. Doubtlessly he hoped that such a condition might be reestablished under wise and helpful legislation enacted by Congress. But, alas, his hopes in that direction were doomed to disappointment. Whether those who are left behind will be able to follow his farsighted vision remains to be seen.

To-day we are met to pay a last tribute of respect to his memory. His genial presence is missed by all of his associates in either branch of Congress. Such men as he who serve their country well and faithfully are always missed when they pass to that bourn whence no traveler ever returns. In this hour we say from the depths of our hearts, Good friend, faithful public servant, thoroughgoing American, hail and farewell!

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, it is with sorrow that it becomes my duty at this time to speak of the life and character of the late Senator GALLINGER, an honored resident of my congressional district for more than a half century. JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER was born on a farm near Cornwall, Canada, March 28, 1837. He was one of 12 children. His parents were without financial means. During his early boyhood he walked to the log schoolhouse, a mile and a half from home, where he was taught to read, write, and do sums in arithmetic. At the age of 11 years he was indentured to the village editor, and three years later finished his apprenticeship with him. His wages the first year were $8, board, and lodging; the second year he received $24, board, and lodging, and the third and last year of his apprenticeship he received $60, board, and lodging. He was then qualified as a journeyman printer. He then went to Ogdensburg, N. Y., where he worked as a journeyman printer. While employed setting type in the office of the St. Lawrence Republican in Ogdensburg, he received a letter from a cousin, a professor in a medical college in Cincinnati, Ohio, advising him to become a doctor. The suggestion was accepted. He started for Cincinnati and arrived there with $100 in his pocket, which was all of his worldly possessions, $60 of which was paid at once for a course of medical lectures. He and two other students rented two rooms, where they cooked their meals and slept. He immediately found employment on the Cincinnati Gazette, first setting type, then reading proof, and later reporting shipping news along the river and court news over in Covington, Ky.

Thus the young man worked diligently to earn a livelihood and pay his way at the medical school. Each day's work engaged his attention from 8 o'clock in the morning until 12 or 1 o'clock the next morning, attending medical lectures and performing his work upon the newspaper.

He graduated with honors from the medical school in 1858. After that he was abroad two years and pursued further the study of medicine and surgery. Returning to the United States, he located in Concord, N. H., and began the practice of his profession, which he pursued in that city and the surrounding country for 23 years. His robust physique, which had served him so well during his stay in Cincinnati, continued to permit him during the years of the active practice of his profession to travel day and night making his calls to relieve the sufferings and ills of his patients; his patrons and clientele took him miles into the country at all times of the day and night. I have heard him say that often he had been called out from his house a half dozen times between supper and breakfast, many times for trips into the country.

He was soon recognized as a leader in his profession. His skill, his cheerful word and manner, and his magnetic presence contributed to his personal advantage and made friends for him which lasted for life. Dr. GALLINGER's professional practice was not confined to the territorial limits of the city of Concord or the county of Merrimack, in which he lived, but extended to people living in towns and parishes in bordering States. His reputation and standing as a physician and surgeon will be preserved in the hearts of the generation that knew him as steadfastly as the granite rock in the mountain side of our State.

While pursuing diligently the practice of his profession, which he loved and honored, some of his friends nominated him as a candidate for the office of moderator in the fourth ward of the city of Concord; the remuneration for that service was $5. He served one term and declined a reelection to that distinguished honor. It marked, however, the beginning of a political career. Soon after his precinct elected him as their representative in the house of representatives of the State legislature, and he served his precinct well and faithfully in that branch in 1872 and 1873, and later in 1891. The same precinct elected him as its member to the State constitutional convention of 1876. Dr. GALLINGER's ability and fidelity to service in this branch of the legislature was particularly noticeable. The senatorial district in which he lived elected him a member of the State senate in 1878, 1879, and 1880, and that body selected him as its presiding officer twice, for the years 1879 and 1880.

During the years 1879 and 1880 Dr. GALLINGER held the office, by appointment of the governor of New Hampshire, of surgeon general of the State National Guard, with the rank of brigadier general.

Early in life Senator GALLINGER became affiliated with the Republican Party; its principles appealed to him. The Republican State committee urged him to accept the important and onerous position as chairman. He yielded to the request, and from 1882 to 1890 performed the duties of that office with satisfaction to all. When he resigned many regrets were expressed and his resignation was reluctantly accepted. Again, in 1898, the Republican State committee appealed to him to accept the chairmanship, and after eight years' absence from that place he accepted and continued in that position until 1908, when he resigned. In discharging the duties of this office Senator GALLINGER impressed those who came in contact with him with his industry and ability to master details as well as broad questions of policy, and his term of service in that capacity was successful and longer than any other man in the history of our party in the State.

Our people elected him a delegate to represent them in the Republican National Convention of 1888, 1900, 1904, and 1908, and he was chosen by the delegation as its chairman for each of those conventions. Thus it will be noted that the people of New Hampshire had unbounded confidence in his integrity, his ability, and his adaptability to represent them in various capacities.

Such, briefly, are the historical facts that speak volumes in behalf of the esteem in which Senator GALLINGER was held by the Republicans of the Granite State. His life was active in doing good for others and closely interwoven with the history of our State for more than half a century. But this is not all; the people of New Hampshire recognized that Senator GALLINGER's activities and ability should not be confined to the local activities of the State. In 1884 he was elected a Representative in Congress from the second congressional district, and reelected in 1886, and declined a renomination and reelection in 1888. Thus, it will be seen from the 4th of March, 1885, until the 4th of March, 1889, he was called upon to serve his people in a larger and broader sphere in the Halls of Congress. During his two terms his services attracted Nation-wide attention. After declining a reelection, in 1888, to Congress, he intended to return to the city of Concord and pursue the practice of his profession, but it was impossible; men from all parts of the State sought his advice on public questions. In 1891 he was elected to the United States Senate, his term of service beginning March 4; he was reelected in 1897, 1903, 1909, and in 1914, the latter election being by popular vote. He served continuously as Senator from March 4, 1891, until the 17th day of August, 1918, the date of his death; his services as our representative in the House and Senate covering a period of 31 years 5 months and 13 days, more than a quarter of a century, in the highest legislative body of our land, being the dean of the Senate in point of continuous service.

A notable characteristic of Senator GALLINGER was his clear vision into the future—I might say, anticipated the advent of questions that were to become momentous public issues. To illustrate: He early espoused the cause of prohibition; calmly, consistently, and courageously advocated the same on all proper occasions; through his long public career he never wavered, and had his life been prolonged six months he would have seen our country adopt his views thereon.

Many years ago he became an advocate of equal suffrage for women, at a time when he was almost a pioneer in that belief; yet he lived to see it one of the great problems confronting the American people and the peoples of the Old World. When he first espoused the cause in favor of these far-reaching principles he displayed courage that was characteristic of the man. Many of his friends felt and advised him that it was unwise for him to continue to advise the public of his belief in the cause; many were emphatic, and told him that it would injure him politically, yet he continued not heeding their advice; in his subsequent candidacies he received the sincere and active support of many men who disagreed with him on one or both of these issues, due, as I believe, to the fact that they admired his candor, his sincerity, and his wisdom.

Senator GALLINGER early espoused the cause of the veterans of the Civil War; in his national activities in Congress assisted with force and power every worthy case that was presented to him. In the Senate for many years he was chairman of the committee that considered general and special legislation relating to pensions. The candor and sympathetic spirit with which he administered justice in these classes of legislation made him an honored friend by our surviving heroes of that conflict.

To recount the legislative career of Senator GALLINGER would require a volume, and his wisdom as a public servant well merits a fulsome biography. His extraordinary ability as a legislator is the more remarkable for the reason that he was educated for the medical profession. Most public servants and statesmen select one great measure on which to focus their energies; most of them have a pet measure with which to occupy their time when momentous issues do not hold the center of the stage. Not so with Senator GALLINGER. He was ever alert to the needs of his State and country; his information and foresight upon large public questions seemed almost boundless. The tariff, the establishment of an adequate merchant marine, the enlargement of our Navy, the extension of our system of education, measures relating to health, and the development and beautification of our National Capital found in him an earnest and forceful advocate.

Let me briefly recall his beneficial services and advice in behalf of the development and making the city of Washington, our Nation's Capital, one of the most beautiful among all the capitals of the world. When he entered the United States Senate he was appointed a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, serving thereon for more than 20 years, the latter half of his services being chairman of the committee. This work was agreeable to him; he enjoyed the vast opportunities presented; he visioned the needs of the National Capital early in his service and began systematically to bring about many needed reforms and improvements. The cool streams and forest glades of Rock Creek Park owe their improvement and conservation to his efforts. The beautiful memorial to the late President Lincoln, known as the Lincoln Memorial; the Connecticut Avenue highway bridge; the highway bridge across the Potomac; Piney Branch bridge on Sixteenth Street; and the Massachusetts Avenue bridge will be silent and perpetual monuments of his foresight and efforts.

He was active and earnest in the promotion and establishment of a filtration plant to improve the drinking water furnished by the water system of the city, and at the time of his death a half million people there were enjoying the benefit of that needed improvement.

The Zoological Park, with 170 acres, is additional evidence of his wisdom and energy. One of the finest testimonials to his sense of civic beauty was the improvement and establishment of Potomac Park and the construction of the beautiful driveways thereon, and the development of the plan for improvements of that portion of the city lying between the Capitol Building and the westerly portion of the Potomac Drive, so called.

During his entire service in the Senate he was particularly active and aided in the improvement of the educational system and of the school buildings and surroundings of the District. His efforts were so noticeable and so well directed that he was familiarly referred to by the people residing in the National Capital as the "Mayor of Washington." His attention was early in his service directed to the hospital conditions of the District, and one of the last and much-needed improvements was the new municipal hospital that he urged, and largely by his influence and patience was finally authorized. It is now being constructed on the extension of Massachusetts Avenue. As a fitting token of the appreciation and esteem of his untiring energy and efforts in causing the same to be established and constructed, it has been named and is now known as the Gallinger Hospital. When completed and ready for occupancy, the million-dollar structure will stand for centuries a silent and eloquent tribute to the memory and distinguished services of the man whose name it bears.

Senator GALLINGER was particularly honored on his seventy-fourth birthday, March 28, 1911. His friends in Washington arranged a banquet in his honor at the New Willard Hotel and 500 persons attended. Among those in attendance was the President of the United States, Cabinet officers, ambassadors, Members of the Supreme Court, Senators, Congressmen, and prominent citizens of the District of Columbia and from other parts of the country. It was a notable gathering, a tribute seldom paid to a living man. The decorations were exquisite. Enthusiasm for Senator GALLINGER, the guest of the evening, was unbounded, as shown by the incidents during the dinner. Permit me to refer to one—the waiters marched into the banquet hall with letters on their trays that spelled "Gallinger." As the party saw the name they arose from their seats, cheering and waiving their napkins in the air; the orchestra struck up "What is the matter with father," and the diners caught the sentiment instantly and sang—substituting the word "Gallinger" for "father," ending with the enthusiastic "He's all right." The speakers dwelt at length upon the wisdom, judgment, patience, and successful efforts of Senator GALLINGER in his efforts to improve and beautify the National Capital.

President Taft said:

> You could not use the function of a dinner for a better or higher purpose than to testify your gratitude and that of all good citizens of the United States to a servant and a Senator who does things because they are to do good to the people.

The chairman of the District Commissioners, Mr. Rudolph, speaking of the Senator, said:

> He has with untiring devotion studied our needs and problems, and with wisdom and courage never failed to advocate and press such measures as would aid in making this the greatest city of the world.

A former District Commissioner, Mr. Macfarland, said:

> I can testify that the unexampled appropriations and legislation obtained for the District of Columbia were due more to you [Mr. GALLINGER] than to any other one man in Congress.

The Yankee poet wished that he might live in a house by the side of the road and be a friend to man. "Officially as well as personally you have lived that way."

Gen. Harries said:

> The good works done by Senator GALLINGER and of the evils he has checked there is not, nor can be, any catalogue.

Capt. James F. Oyster said:

> The people of Washington are thankful to the people of his State for sending him here.

The life of Senator GALLINGER, replete with beneficial duties for mankind and for his adopted State and country, adds another name to the long list of statesmen, residents of New Hampshire, during the preceding century and a half.

Senator GALLINGER was a self-made man in every respect; his push and perseverance exhibited in early life enabled him to get his education; that education laid the foundation for his future life of activity and usefulness. The habits thus formed in his boyhood days were retained throughout his busy life until his death. Day by day, month by month, in the execution of life's responsibilities he progressed and advanced; he was not satisfied until he had reached the highest pinnacle of understanding of each and every effort before him. He was endowed with a robust constitution and a wonderful power of endurance, which served him well during his fourscore years of life. He was a courteous man, an affable man, a sincere man, a man with strong convictions, tender-hearted, and his sympathies were with the downtrodden and the oppressed. There was no deception or sham in his nature; he abhorred them. He easily made friends and retained them, and was ever enlarging his circle of friends and admirers. These attributes were a part of his nature from early manhood until life's end. He was a public speaker, possessing great convincing power and force; his reasoning was logical, sound, and clear; he possessed the ability to sway his hearers by sincere, logical, and forceful explanations of his subject.

For many years when the Senator became weary and tired by close application to the arduous duties required of him in Congress, or when Congress was not in session, he intensely enjoyed a visit to his country home, known as "The Poplars," a picturesque farm and buildings in the town of Salisbury, N. H., situated on an elevation just east of Kearsarge Mountain. There, among the rare flowers which he grew and was very fond of, and beneath the beautiful shade trees overlooking the green fields and pasture and timberland of his estate, he communed with nature and, lulled to rest and sleep by the music of the song birds and the chattering of the squirrels, his weary and overburdened constitution would revive, his energy return, and with renewed vigor he would resume the responsibilities of public life. It was here that he spent many pleasant days and enjoyed needed relaxation from busy life. It was here that he was resting and enjoying life when he became ill and answered the summons of the Great Master. The news of his death was received by the public with sadness and grief by his colleagues and the people in the National Capital and by the people of his adopted State. The activities of the city of Concord, the capital of our State, were recessed and public and private buildings were draped in mourning as the last rites were performed. The church was inadequate to accommodate the throng of people who came from afar and near and by their presence expressed their love, admiration, and profound respect for the man of remarkable age whose noble deeds for humanity, covering a period of more than a half century, will be tenderly remembered and often recalled and referred to by future generations.

Cold in the dust the perished heart may lie,
But that which warmed it once can never die.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege, and I deem it a high privilege, to know Senator GALLINGER for 30 years and I was always proud during all of that period to be able to call him my friend. I was proud of Senator GALLINGER not only as a man but as a public functionary. Senator GALLINGER had a singleness of purpose in his public work. He was interested only in the welfare of the Nation. He had no private ax to grind, if I may so speak. He was constantly in search of methods to improve the condition of our people. He had fine courage, ability, and genius to serve the Government's needs. He was a true statesman. He recognized the fact that a public official was the servant of the people. He saw that public office was simply an opportunity to serve. He realized that the more nearly one came to serving the people and advancing and promoting their welfare the more nearly he would come to ameliorating conditions that needed improvement.

Senator GALLINGER had a disposition as gentle as a girl. He was sweet, courteous, refined, attractive, magnetic, always approachable, and yet he had strength of character that marked him in a conspicuous way among his associates in public life. He was afraid of nothing. He had the courage to speak; he had opinions, and he was not afraid to express them. He shaped the legislation of the Nation calculated to be of advantage to the generations of the future as much as did any other one man who occupied a high public place either in the House or in the Senate. He was constantly alert to the need of America's expanding commerce, and in season and out of season he worked tirelessly to accomplish that object. He believed that America should stand on a basis of equality in its merchant shipping with any other nation in the world, and he never lost an opportunity to advocate legislation to that end. He saw the need as few men did of protecting the American market for the American people. He believed in the protection of American industry. He believed that the productions of labor from European markets should not be permitted to enter American ports for free distribution among the American people. He believed that the best way to preserve prosperity in America was to protect America against the invasion of European-made products without the payment of a license fee at the port of entrance. He saw the need of preserving American honor in the conflict which is now happily closed. He stood as one of America's foremost advocates for America's entry into the war. He believed that every assistance possible and necessary should be given to the Commander in Chief to enable him to accomplish victory. He believed that the only way you could raise a successful army was by conscription, and his words and votes are recorded in the records of the Congress of the United States in favor of the advancement of every American measure.

To his genius and his courage and his foresight and his untiring devotion and his unselfish work is due more than any other man in history the development of this beautiful city as the Capital of the Nation. I can recall sitting on conferences with him when his heart went out to the suffering poor who had no place to go, no money to pay their doctor's bill, and how he insisted on provision being made for their care in the hospitals of this city. I can see him now pleading for greater opportunities for education for the children of this city and of the country, for the building of our public institutions of learning, for proper compensation for the teachers of this great community. I can see him pleading for them on the theory that they were making greater sacrifices than any other class of our citizens. I can see him pleading for their future welfare by increasing their compensation to a point where they could have a decent livelihood. I can see him looking into the future of the Nation by providing legislation that would mean better conditions for everyone hereafter.

I saw him pass away from the activities of this life, and I believe I can see him now or hear his voice in a better land beyond. I believe that we can communicate with men like JACOB GALLINGER, dead to life though they may be; for men like JACOB GALLINGER never die. Their life work still lives; still goes on. Their life work must be an inspiration to those of us who yet remain and those who are yet to come. And if we can but have at the head of the Nation in the generations that are to come men of the patriotic promptings that JACOB GALLINGER possessed, the future of America is safe. We need men of this type at the head of our Government affairs. We need men of unselfish devotion; men who have no personal ambitions except to serve their country. I believe that if the men who are here to-day and who are to follow in the control of the Government of the United States shall but walk in the footsteps of JACOB H. GALLINGER while he acted as a Member of this House and a Member of the Senate, the days for America in the generations, yea, in the centuries, yet to come are safe, and that America will stand before the nations of the world forever to exemplify the life and the strength of this the greatest of all Republics now or yet to come.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, the late Senator from the State of New Hampshire, JACOB H. GALLINGER, was a great and good man, and entitled to the confidence and respect of his fellow men, which he held throughout the whole period of his public life.

Born on a farm just outside of the northern limits of Cornwall, Canada, he determined when but a boy to select for himself a career of usefulness. Being one of a family of 12 children, he, of necessity, had to start out quite early to make his way in the world. He became an apprentice to the printing trade, and it was while working as a printer that he determined to fit himself for a profession. He studied medicine at the Medical Institute at Cincinnati, Ohio, and was graduated at the head of his class with the highest honors in 1858. After a time spent in travel and study, in 1861 he settled in Concord to follow the profession of medicine and surgery. I knew Dr. GALLINGER perhaps longer than any other man in Congress. It was as a practitioner that I first knew him. As a boy in Concord, the city of my birth, I remember him as a successful physician. His practice was not merely local, his services were in demand for advice and consultation by the profession throughout the State. He became widely known and made lasting friends wherever he went, long before he held public office. His industry did not stop with the performance of his arduous duties as a physician; he obtained recognition as a writer of unusual ability, and was a contributor to medical literature. His articles published in the newspapers relating to public questions attracted wide and deserved popular attention.

In politics he was a Republican and a strong party man from the start. Because of his great interest in public affairs he was chosen in 1872 a member of the State legislature, where he served with distinction. In 1876 he was elected a member of the State constitutional convention and advocated a number of important amendments, which were ratified by the people. He rendered valuable service in the State senate, was chosen its presiding officer, and for many years was chairman of the Republican State Committee. Because of his great ability and untiring efforts in behalf of the people he was elected to represent his district in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, and on March 4, 1891, was elevated to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

He did not receive this great honor without passing through the severest political contests and the strongest personal opposition which can come to men holding high office or remaining long in public life. He encountered and overcame obstacles and conquered his opponents through his dominant courage. There was no citizen of the State, no matter how humble, who did not feel free to call upon the Senator for assistance. His services were always freely and willingly given, and because of the affection in which he was held by his home folks they returned him to Congress repeatedly, where he won the esteem and admiration of his colleagues by his eminent service in both branches of the National Legislature. Through perseverance, self-reliance, and great natural ability he advanced in influence and power until he achieved the distinction of being chosen the leader of his party in the upper House of Congress.

It can be stated truthfully that during his long public career he was a genuine and untiring public servant. From 1891 to the time of his death he remained continuously in the Senate, having served for a longer period of time than any other Senator from New Hampshire. Because of his great knowledge of governmental affairs his counsel was always sought on public questions which were subjects for legislation. His advice was desired equally on problems and policies in which his party was concerned both in Congress and at State and National conventions. As a man of sound logic, his judgment was ever desired and always valued. He was a conspicuous figure in Republican politics for nearly half of a century.

As the minority leader of the Senate, he showed superior qualities as a parliamentarian. Ready and powerful in debate, he took an active part in the solution of the great problems of government during all the period of his service in both Houses of Congress. He bore no ill will toward those who opposed him and enjoyed the respect equally of political friend and foe. Always kindly and sympathetic and with a high sense of personal honor, a promise given to a colleague was with him a compact to be carried out with strict fidelity. In the late war he gave unswerving support to the President in every measure having for its purpose the successful termination of the conflict.

I was one of a committee appointed by the Speaker to attend the funeral of Senator GALLINGER at Concord. The exceptional honor paid to his memory on that occasion by the officials of his State is worthy of note. As an extraordinary evidence of the respect and veneration in which he was held, his remains were taken to the Capitol Building, there to lie in state, that the people of the city and of the Commonwealth he so long and honorably represented might pay their final tribute to him. Only once before was a similar mark of respect shown to a citizen of New Hampshire, and that was on the occasion of the death of a former President of the United States, Franklin Pierce. From all over the old Granite State and from many sections of the country sorrowing friends attended the last exercises over the body of the departed statesman.

Senator GALLINGER's life was unique in many particulars. Despite his great age, he reached the zenith of his power and popularity when he was called to his last reward. In all the history of our public men few served in Congress for so long a period as Senator GALLINGER, and it is doubtful if any departed leaving a greater good will than did the Senator from New Hampshire. The annoyances and difficulties incident to a public career did not corrode his nature or alter his kindly disposition. He remained to the end of his industrious and distinguished career the same courteous gentleman I first knew as a young physician in Concord. Dr. GALLINGER went out of this life with a consciousness of duty well and faithfully performed and with the lasting friendship of his colleagues and associates; he closed his long and splendid career possessing the confidence, respect, and admiration of the entire Nation.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as a plain citizen of the Republic, Senator GALLINGER was well worth knowing. Aside from his wide knowledge of public men and affairs of government, he had an alluring personality. He was gifted with delightful social qualities and a rare sense of humor, without which, to quote the specious words of Richard La Gallienne, "the heart of humanity had long since broken."

I knew Senator GALLINGER well; was associated with him for four months in 1912 in the prolonged contest of the conferees of the Senate and House on my dollar-a-day pension bill; again, at two famous banquets in this Capital in honor of the eightieth and eighty-second birthdays of the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois. Of the 12 present at the last banquet, May 7, 1918, Senator GALLINGER was one of the octogenarians. Like a majority of our public men of enduring fame, Senator GALLINGER was the sole architect of his remarkable public career. It is history that a majority of our most successful and longest enduring public men were born poor and started life without the advantages of a liberal or college education.

Gen. Andrew Jackson, born of a North Carolina farm laborer, with no opportunities for an education, was the commander of a volunteer army, winner of the only land battle in the war of 1812, twice President of the United States, in 1828 and 1832, always on the firing line in war, and leaving an honorable and enduring record in peace. Henry Clay, born poor, self-educated, self-made, was the foremost orator and statesman of a whole generation of public men. Abraham Lincoln, born in a Kentucky log cabin, who never saw the inside of a university and who learned to read books at night by the light of a pine-knot fire, became the guiding hand in the grandest epoch-making era of all civilization. His oration on the battle field of Gettysburg is the most inspiring and glorious classic of all languages.

I know of Senator GALLINGER's boyhood days, and of his early manhood struggles to win recognition and honor in the battle of life. His record in the New Hampshire Legislature, in the National House of Representatives, and in the Senate, covering 47 years of continuous service, has never been equaled by any public man that New England ever honored with a public trust. And his career differs from that of any public man of continental fame of New England birth in that he died in office in the full favor and affection of the people of his State, and not a disappointed man like Daniel Webster, another great son of New Hampshire, or James G. Blaine, of Maine, or Henry Clay, of Kentucky. Even Charles Sumner, ranking among the first of New England's great sons, was officially criticized in a resolution by the Legislature of Massachusetts, and died a disappointed man.

While New Hampshire is one of the smallest States in the Union in area and population, ranking as the fourteenth in population, it not only furnished in Daniel Webster the foremost orator and statesman of the ante-bellum period, but during the Civil War a private soldier—Walter Kettridge—who composed by the light of a bivouac fire the finest and most pathetic lyric song of the entire war—"Tenting To-night on the Old Camp Ground."

And New Hampshire also was the birthplace and home of the greatest family of patriotic singers ever known in the United States. I refer to the famous Hutchinson family. It is among my earliest and most enduring memories that I heard these singers of thrilling lyrics in 1845, when as a barefoot boy, in the open air one starlit night, to the accompaniment of the bells, I heard these soul-inspiring songs. Sixteen years later the same family sang the patriotic songs of the Civil War around the gleaming bivouac fires of the Army of the Potomac.

We should not let this occasion pass without gathering some lesson of value to the living, especially to the young men of to-day who, like our departed friend in his boyhood, are struggling against what seems adverse fate. The brightest gleam of hope for the poor young men of to-day is in the knowledge that the greatest men who have ever served or shone in the high places of power in this Republic have been, like Senator GALLINGER, of humble birth and limited opportunities in boyhood.

I am not here to decry a college education. I believe there is some merit in one couplet of an old English poet:

'Tis education forms the common mind;
Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined.

But we have many notable instances in our history of too much cultivation of the common mind, where this excessive cultivation, like the long cultivation of the old tobacco lands of Virginia, has exhausted all the original substance of the soil. It sometimes happens that too much acquired book knowledge drives out all intuitive perception or original thought. Hence we have many notable instances where the robust mind of a robust man, who is compelled to graduate in the school of hard knocks and common sense, proves the most successful citizen or public official.

And let us here in this historic Chamber reconsecrate ourselves to that patriotism that was always so fervently typified in our dead friend, a statesman whose association and friendship added to our joys of living, and whose character and example gave us hope for higher ideals in government.

Such graves as his are pilgrim shrines,
Shrines to no code or creed confined—
The Delphian vales, the Palestines,
The Meccas of the mind.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, Senator GALLINGER became a member of the United States Senate seven years before I became a Member of this House. I never met him until I met him in this Capitol. I had read of him so much in the New England newspapers that I felt acquainted with him even before I met him here. He had a very remarkable career, as I knew it by an intimate knowledge of what occurred in his life as recorded faithfully in the papers, which then kept full account of New England movements and New England public men.

Coming to this House in 1898, I was assigned by Speaker Reed to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I have served on that committee continuously since I have been a Member of the House.

A few years ago when committee appointments were desired on the Republican side of the House I had one or two other committee assignments which I voluntarily surrendered to accommodate some of my colleagues who desired to be recognized, and since that time I have devoted my whole attention to the work of that committee, of which I was chairman three and one-half years, and thus I was brought in close contact with Senator GALLINGER, as he was a member of the Committee on Commerce in the Senate of the United States. He was concerned in everything that related to advantage for the American merchant marine. He was a firm believer in retaining for the American-owned vessels and American-commanded vessels the right and privilege of our coastwise trade. That, I think, was one of his strongest contentions. And I learned from him many years ago of the advantages that would come from such a course. Since I have been here there has been considerable contention in the committee of which I have been a member toward relaxing that restriction and allowing the coastwise trade to be entered into by foreign-built vessels.

We talk sometimes of maintaining great armies and great navies in order that our honor may be preserved. I have always believed in keeping the Nation strong. There is no stronger element for the preservation of the American Nation than the preservation of the coastwise trade for American-built and American-commanded vessels, for the reason that if any enemy approached our coast, either on the Atlantic or the Pacific, if the vessels of the coastwise trade were manned by American seamen and the vessels were commanded by American officers, then we had a coast guard in addition to our Navy which would detect at any time the approach of an enemy coming to attack our coast. For that reason he and I agreed we would be entirely unwise to admit foreign-owned, foreign-built, or foreign-manned vessels to the coastwise trade.

He was very much interested in the establishment of foreign trade. He believed in building up a great merchant marine. I was a firm believer in that policy myself before I became a Member of this House, and I have been a very much stronger advocate since I have been here than I ever was before. I believe that we should long ago have made every effort to upbuild our American merchant marine, and if we had performed that duty we should have been very much better prepared for war than we were because of so many years' delay in not attending to that great essential of supremacy upon the seas.

Arguments were brought to bear in a great many instances in regard to the lack of necessity for providing an American merchant marine. One of them was that other nations could carry our products cheaper than we could carry them ourselves; and consequently, if we wanted to keep transportation we must not encourage an American merchant marine, which would be more costly, but to maintain the facilities which we then enjoyed would be very much cheaper.

Senator GALLINGER and others persistently fought against what we believed was a false idea. And since we have been in war one great fact has been revealed, and that is that some men who were away from the seacoast and who contended that the price of their products would be favorably affected by the reduction in freight rates have been convinced since the recent war that prices of the products of the farm were made on this side of the water and the freight was added to the cost, whatever it might be, and the purchasers paid the freight.

Senator GALLINGER's career was certainly very remarkable. He was not a native of the United States, but he was every inch a typical American.

The dividing line between British North America and the United States it would be hard to define. I have many constituents who were born in the same country where Senator GALLINGER was born and who came and settled amongst us in this country, and they are amongst the strongest adherents of our national cause to-day, equal in their belief in and their devotion to the American Nation with those who are natives to the soil.

I have been looking somewhat over Senator GALLINGER's career in public life, in the State of New Hampshire in the Senate, in the constitutional convention, and also his career in this House, where he served for two terms with honor to himself and credit to his State, and also in the Senate of the United States, where he served from 1891 up to the day of his departure to another life. His public career was purely unselfish. He held a high position among the public men of his generation.

He was no timeserver. He was not a man who failed to take a stand on any public question. He was radically a Republican, but he was broad enough to see very much beyond simply the party line. A gentleman said to me, "You are not going to call Senator GALLINGER a Progressive?" I said, "No, not in a political sense." I would not call him a "Progressive," because he never had a tincture of progressivism in political theory, but he was progressive in every act of his career. He was an advanced thinker and an advanced doer of great things. He never was backward in anything that he undertook. He put himself forward and served his country at every opportunity.

Allusion has been made by some of the Members who have preceded me to his great work in the United States Senate in behalf of the District of Columbia. I think he was one of the foremost friends of this much-neglected part of our country when it comes to questions of legislation.

He was persistent and foremost during all of his career in endeavoring to secure justice to the people of this most important part of our country, who have no representative in either branch of the Congress. He was interested in everything that meant for the public advancement here, both in regard to public health and in regard to public education. He was a trustee of the George Washington University of this city, a very useful institution. I happen to have a son who was a graduate from the law department of that university, and I frequently talked with Senator GALLINGER in regard to the interests of the university after my son became connected with it, and I found him very broad in all his views in regard to education.

My education was limited in early life, and I have always regretted that I did not then value the advantage which a good education affords; but I want to say, for the encouragement of the youth of to-day, that if any young man does not obtain the education that he thinks he ought to have he ought to take the example of a man like the late Senator GALLINGER, who took advantage of every opportunity that was presented to him; although his educational facilities were not as great as those of some of the young men of to-day, he patiently and persistently pursued the task set before him. He had great natural abilities, and he acquired a wide knowledge of every subject that he undertook to enter upon, and it should be a matter of encouragement to the rising generation to appreciate the opportunities that our country affords. No other country on the face of the earth affords any such opportunities.

Whatever may be concluded in the settlement of the great controversy between other nations through which we have recently passed, whatever may be the final settlement of the great questions that will arise from that conflict, the United States will certainly be one of the foremost of all nations in bringing about a proper settlement of the great problems that will be considered at the peace conference now in session. Senator GALLINGER wrote me a letter in 1915, inclosing to me a bill prepared by himself, and I laid it aside where I could put my hand on it at any time, not then thinking that I would have occasion to refer to it on such an occasion as this. But it has come to my mind that perhaps I ought to refer to it. It is a measure that he introduced in the Senate of the United States on December 7, 1915, entitled "A bill to encourage American shipbuilding and navigation, to establish American ocean mail lines, to increase the naval reserve, and to promote the commerce of the United States."

I have looked that bill over with a great deal of interest. It provided means which if enacted into law might have built up the American merchant marine. It was a method which I long believed in, and which I had tried several times during my membership in this House to have the House favorably consider. Once my party associates succeeded in getting it through this House by a very small margin, but the bill failed in the Senate by reason of the adjournment of a session of the Congress before action could be had. At a subsequent time the Senate passed a bill of that nature, and it came over to this House, but failed of enactment here by one vote. Senator GALLINGER at that time introduced the bill in the Senate, and I very gladly voted for it and worked for it here. I believed in that method of upbuilding a merchant marine rather than by a wasteful expenditure of money.

We have now what is called an American merchant marine established. It has been rather a costly experiment. Enough money was placed by the Congress to the credit of the Shipping Board, nearly $4,000,000,000, to construct 10 Panama Canals, and notwithstanding that vast sum was granted there was only a limited number of vessels that were available to help us win the war. We won the war in spite of our lack of an American merchant marine.

And though we may have failed in some respects, we have undoubtedly prepared the way for future Congresses to provide an American merchant marine. Recently I noticed that the president of the Shipping Board was busy across the water preparing for the establishment of our foreign trade; but before they can get American shipping in shape to compete with the shipping interests abroad we shall have to wipe out at least $1,000,000,000, and I fear we shall be compelled to wipe out a second billion of dollars before we can successfully meet the competition with the nations which have been for so long a period of years taking care of their merchant marine, while we, as a Nation, have slumbered.

Senator GALLINGER was a member of the Merchant Marine Commission which visited important shipping ports in our own country and subsequently visited foreign countries investigating the necessity of the United States having a merchant marine and to ascertain what hindrances existed there to reestablishing our foreign trade. Senator GALLINGER submitted an elaborate report. Gen. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, late a Member of this House, was a member of that commission, as was also Senator LODGE, who became the successor of Senator GALLINGER as the leader in the Senate. They made a very full investigation. Their reports are a matter of record in the Library of Congress and they showed a great deal of interest in this all-pervading subject which I believe will be interesting and helpful for the Congress in the months that are to confront us in the near future.

I regret very much we can not have the advantage of Senator GALLINGER's presence to help us to solve this great shipping problem, but, as I have stated, his work during his life will be helpful in the solution thereof.

Allusion was made by the gentleman who preceded me to a luncheon that those of our membership who have passed three score years and ten in this House have been invited to participate for the third time. Senator GALLINGER was present last year at the last anniversary of the birth of Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON on May 7, 1918. Several Members who were present at the first and subsequent luncheons have passed away. Senator GALLINGER was present there last year, and from his appearance then all who participated therein expected that we should have the pleasure of his presence for another gathering when the next anniversary of the birth of Mr. CANNON should occur. But Senator GALLINGER has gone to that bourne from which no traveler ever returns. We appreciate the great work he did, we recognize the record he made here, and we admire his breadth of character, his engaging personality, and we appreciate also his ability and faithfulness in every work in which he engaged. I was appointed a member of the committee which attended the funeral of the late Senator. His body was carried to the capitol building in the city of Concord and there laid in state. At the church where the funeral exercises were held Senator LODGE delivered an eloquent and fitting eulogy on the life, character, and public services of the late Senator, his former associate and personal friend.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to know JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER for nearly a quarter of a century. While our acquaintance and association was not particularly intimate it was of such a character—personal, social, and official—as to enable me to form an intelligent opinion of him and was the foundation of a sincere appreciation of and respect and regard for this distinguished man who for so many years ably represented the Commonwealth of New Hampshire in the Congress of the United States.

That JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER was a great and good man was eloquently and conclusively demonstrated by the fact of the long period of his exalted public service and the number and variety of the distinguished honors and heavy responsibilities placed and conferred upon him during the many years of his active life. No man who did not possess the virtues and endowments of honesty, courage, industry, and ability in a marked and unusual degree could for so long a period of time have retained the affection, confidence, and support of the sane, sensible, and discerning people of the Commonwealth of New Hampshire.

We are reminded by Holy Writ that there is a difference in the quality of glory celestial and terrestrial. Every light that shines to illuminate the physical, the moral, the spiritual pathways of men has its own individual and peculiar virtues. Each has its particular mission for good and each differs from the other in the character of the helpful influence and impression it exerts and creates.

Out of the many helpful, stimulating, and illuminating qualities of the character of our departed friend, two in particular challenged my attention and won my admiration—his steadfastness and his modesty. These are not essential attributes of greatness; in fact they are qualities that have been sadly lacking in the character of some truly great men. The possession of these qualities, however, serve to accentuate other great qualities of heart and mind, and the possession of them brings to their possessor, who is otherwise distinguished, not only the appreciation of his great qualities but the added tribute of unqualified respect and sincere personal affection and regard.

Take him all in all, JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER possessed the kind of character we might wish for our best beloved and dearest friend. The honors that came to him will be long remembered and cherished as a valuable possession of memory by friend and relative, but, after all, that which really counts and will form the most precious heritage of memory will be the praiseworthy way in which he accepted and bore these honors; the modesty, the fidelity, and the wisdom with which he discharged the responsibilities which those honors brought. His earthly work is finished, but the beneficial effect of his work and accomplishments will long continue; above all, the influence of his character, of the great and worthy qualities of his mind and heart, has become a part of the immortal, helpful, moral forces of the universe.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to have known men of the generation in which Senator GALLINGER was a great leader. The generation that is passing with Senator GALLINGER has contributed more to mankind than any generation that preceded it in the history of civilization. No other generation has seen such progress for the welfare of mankind as this generation has seen. This progress has been largely the result of the high purpose and constructive statesmanship of the men whom that generation selected for their leaders. Men of mediocre ability were not sent to the front lines for action by that virile generation of great men. Mark the achievements. When Senator GALLINGER came he found matters much as they had been for centuries. The progress of civilization had been slow and marked by few milestones. Men and women were still carding, spinning, and weaving by hand. They drove their flocks and herds for miles to market.

They tilled their soil and sowed their grain and garnered their harvests with simple implements. Financial and fiscal systems were unstable and inefficient. Economic policies ministered only at short intervals to the welfare of the people statesmen sought to serve.

Senator GALLINGER'S generation of statesmen have led the civilization of the world in the reformation of all of those things. He was a part of that great constructive statesmanship. He saw the rapid advance that was made from the spinning wheel and the loom to the finished machinery and great factories of to-day that minister to the necessities and welfare of mankind. He saw and was part of the statesmanship that adjusted finances and economic policies of this Nation so that industry, finance, and commerce were stabilized.

It is a privilege to have known such a man. Death was kind to him in that it delayed the day of its visit to him until it found him in the ripeness of his years yet in full possession of all those qualities of heart and brain that fit their possessor for usefulness to mankind. He was yet in the possession of all his faculties in a high degree, was still the leader of men, yea indeed the leader in the Senate of the United States, the greatest legislative body of its kind in his day in the world. It was his privilege to be taken from life during his leadership of that great body.

What a mysterious messenger after all is Death. It comes, removes its victim from place of leadership as well as from place of little note and yet does not disturb the world in its progress. The morning after Senator GALLINGER'S death the affairs of the world went on. The Senate and this House paused awhile with bowed heads and paid a tribute to his memory and then resumed under other leadership the work from which he had been taken.

Senator GALLINGER'S place will be filled by other men. Few, however, will take to public life and to positions of leadership, the higher order of constructive statesmanship, that he possessed in so rare a degree. He was modest and patient. He respected those who differed with him. I saw him for four months in almost daily sessions of a conference with a conferee who would not sign the conference report. After opening the conference Senator GALLINGER would say, "Are the conferees ready to sign the conference report?" One would answer in the negative. Senator GALLINGER would say, "The conference is adjourned until Thursday." A rare patience, a patience that finally brought a unanimous report.

His life was full of years and honors when he left life to solve the mystery of death. May we have more like him in the days to come when we need them.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, it is well that we should on this beautiful Sabbath Day pause to pay just tribute to the character and memory of JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER, New Hampshire's foremost citizen, who has peacefully passed to the great beyond after a life full of usefulness, not only to the State which was proud to honor him, but the great Republic he served so long and well.

His record is a prominent part in the legislative proceedings and achievements of the American Congress for more than a quarter of a century. His words and deeds are recorded in the enduring records of the greatest legislative body in the world and during the most important period in the history of the Nation. When Senator GALLINGER was a Member of the lower House of Congress, one of Ohio's illustrious statesmen, John Sherman, was the President pro tempore of the Senate, along with the brilliant John J. Ingalls, from Kansas, who also presided over the Senate during a part of that period, while that able son of Kentucky, John G. Carlisle, was serving as Speaker of this House. While a Member of the Senate the Speakers of the House were John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, David B. Henderson, of Iowa, JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, and CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri.

During Senator GALLINGER'S long, faithful, and conspicuous service in the upper House of Congress, the White House was occupied by Harrison, Cleveland, McKinley, Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson.

What a long, great, and honorable career of fidelity and usefulness! He served in both branches of the New Hampshire Legislature for six terms, was the presiding officer of the State senate, an influential member of the constitutional convention, the surgeon general of the State National Guard, four years of activity in the House of Representatives of the American Congress, to be followed by the people of the State in a promotion to membership in the United States Senate, covering a period of 27 years, or until he was called to his great and final reward.

Through this long period of his official career he was rendering invaluable service to the Republican Party which had honored and trusted him and whose principles he cherished and loved to serve and promote. He was chairman of the Republican State committee 18 years; member of the Republican national executive committee, delegate to four Republican national conventions, chairman of the Republican senatorial committee, and chairman of the joint caucus of Republican Senators and Members of the House here in the Capitol for the past 10 years. He was an able and impartial President pro tempore of the United States Senate during the Sixty-second Congress.

For a moment consider the great and vital legislative questions to which his name was linked: Chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission, vice chairman of the National Waterways Commission, and member of the National Forest Reservation Commission. At the time of his death he was the chairman of the conference of the minority and an influential member of the Committee on Appropriations, Finance, Manufactures, Pacific Railroads, Printing, and Rules.

His many speeches favoring a Merchant Marine and a Protective Tariff are among the strongest, most convincing and unanswerable to be found in the great debates in Congress during the past quarter of a century. His constant and unceasing work for Washington city and the District of Columbia entitle him to the lasting gratitude of the people of the Capital city and every American who is proud of the official home of the Republic.

Senator GALLINGER was intensely an American. The business men trusted him for he believed in promoting and safeguarding the commercial and industrial interests of the country. He never waivered in his advocacy and support of legislation to insure the prosperity and happiness of our great army of industrial workers. He was not unmindful of the old heroes whose courage and valor saved the Union, and legislation for them, their widows, and dependent children received his earnest support. No one in the Congress was more anxious or earnest in aiding in providing needed legislation for our successful prosecution of the great world war. Measures for the welfare and safety of the Republic, for the social, moral, civic, material, intellectual, and patriotic improvement and development of all the people ever found in him an earnest and enthusiastic champion.

Senator GALLINGER was absolutely free from pretense and an utter stranger to hypocrisy. He was open, manly, genial, kind, and could always and under all circumstances be trusted and relied upon to the limit. He was devoted to friends, faithful to constituents, true to party, and loyal to country. The noble deeds to his credit, the splendid example he left, his untarnished name, are precious legacies more enduring and valuable than wealth or rank.

Our families lived beneath the same roof 30 long years ago in this city. He was my esteemed and valued friend and I had every reason to honor, respect, and love him for his unfailing interest and friendship for me and mine.

Mr. Speaker, I offer my simple but heartfelt tribute to the memory of New Hampshire's great and illustrious son, whose private and official deeds will be long remembered and cherished and whose public achievements will not be forgotten by the grateful people of the Republic.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Senator GALLINGER, at Franklin, N. H., in the eighty-second year of his age, on August 17, 1918, New Hampshire lost her most distinguished and influential public servant and the country at large a leader and statesman who had contributed richly to the national welfare.

Three times elected to membership in each branch of the New Hampshire Legislature; a delegate and chairman of the delegation from his State to at least four Republican national conventions; a member of the New Hampshire constitutional convention in 1876, in which body he took a prominent part in formulating amendments which were later submitted to and adopted by the people of his State; a Member of this House in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, where he early took high rank as an intelligent legislator and forceful debater; and a Senator of the United States continuously for more than 27 years, from March 4, 1891, to the date of his death, it may truly be said of Senator GALLINGER that he gave himself wholly and unreservedly to the service of his country. In spite of failing physical powers in recent years, his strength of mind, his grasp of intricate questions, his quickness and acuteness of perception, remained undiminished to the last, and enabled him almost to the day of his death to perform a literally prodigious amount of effective labor.

At no time in his long and highly honorable public career was his service more highly useful to his State and to the Nation than at the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, just closed, when, with the country at war, and himself the leader of his party on the floor of the Senate, he was present almost every day and took an active part in the discussion of all important questions.

He died in harness, as he would have wished to die. He died as serenely and bravely as he lived.

JACOB HAROLD GALLINGER was a fine example of what we often speak of as the "self-made man." Born on a farm in Cornwall, Ontario, Canada, March 28, 1837, receiving the advantages of a common school and an academic education, he started life as a printer. He served his time as an apprentice and became a member of the Union of Journeymen Printers. Later in life he took great pride in the fact that he was a member of organized labor, and the Typographical Union and Plate Printers' Union of Washington, D. C., counted him among their stanchest friends. One of the principal addresses at the great birthday banquet given in his honor by the Chamber of Commerce and the citizens of the District of Columbia in 1911 was delivered by the president of one of the local unions, who presented him with a large silver pitcher in token of the esteem in which he was held by the members of the profession in Washington.

He studied medicine in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he graduated at the head of his class. I, myself, have often heard him speak of the privations and sacrifices made necessary for him by those years of preparation. Well do I remember him 35 years ago, riding day and night in all sorts of weather ministering to the sick throughout the whole country for miles around his home at Concord, N. H., for he was then known as one of the most successful physicians in that locality.

He knew from boyhood the meaning of hard work: long hours had no terrors for him. It was for this reason, I suppose, that he seemed to have scant sympathy with those who in recent times are continually emphasizing the idea that destitution and pauperism and all other ills that flesh is heir to are primarily due to existing conditions of civilized society. Was it not under these same conditions that he had started from the bottom and climbed to the top? Why then tear down, why overturn, why revolutionize?

Admitting always there is a great deal in the present organization of society which might be improved by well-considered legislation, he held strongly to the belief that the chief cause of suffering and distress in the world is found not so much in social as in economic conditions and failings and defects in the individual. He put emphasis upon the duties and responsibilities of the citizen rather more than upon his rights, and if at times he seemed to some of us to put undue stress on the part which individualism must fulfill in our time we must always remember that he was brought up under the influence of the school of the earlier economists, whose fundamental assumption was that free competition involving freedom of contract and individual liberty was universal and all beneficent.

Throughout his whole public career Senator GALLINGER maintained a firm belief in the wisdom of a protective tariff policy. Indeed, this may truly be said to have been the cornerstone of his whole political philosophy. No statesman of his day had studied this question more thoroughly or had a broader comprehension of its meaning. For more than a quarter of a century no man in either branch of Congress was a more earnest, consistent, and forceful advocate of this doctrine. I have before me as I speak a pamphlet containing a speech by him in the Senate on May 16, 17, and 19, 1894. It is entitled "American Tariffs from Plymouth Rock to McKinley." It was later printed and widely distributed throughout the country by the American Protective Tariff League. It purports to be, as indeed it is, a most exhaustive analysis of the arguments both for and against a protective tariff, together with a complete survey of our tariff history from the earliest times. In clearness of statement, wealth of illustration, and comprehensive grasp and treatment of subject-matter, it is to my mind the strongest, as it is altogether the most illuminating, speech on the tariff question that I have ever read.

If any man in the public life of America ever lived to see a position that he had taken thoroughly justified by subsequent events, that man was Senator GALLINGER, with reference to our merchant marine.

For years his voice, with that of his friend, Senator FRYE of Maine, rang out almost alone in the Congress of the United States in eloquent and vigorous protest against the short-sighted and un-American policy under which our flag, once known and honored in every port of the world, had practically disappeared in the foreign commerce of the United States. Again and again he brought home to the American people the incontrovertible facts of history in connection with this subject. He reminded us that once we were masters of the seas, that until after the middle of the 19th century our maritime power was preeminently successful, that then we faced inland and turned our energies and attention to the conquest of our continent—we felled our forest, fenced our fields, broke our prairies, built our highways and railroads, bridged our streams, tunneled our mountains, harnessed our water power, and exploited our mines, built our cities and became the greatest agricultural and industrial country of the world, leaving to other nations the task of carrying our products across the seas. At the outbreak of the Civil War we had two and a half millions of tonnage. By 1891 this had been reduced to a little more than one million and it had not increased at the outbreak of the recent war. Our Navy had greatly increased but our merchant marine had remained undeveloped. Our shipyards had been closed and the shipwrights had turned their energies in other directions.

As chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission appointed under authority of Congress in 1904, Senator GALLINGER spent months taking testimony in all parts of the country—on the coasts of the North and South Atlantic, the Great Lakes, the Pacific, and the Gulf of Mexico. He prepared a very comprehensive and elaborate report embodying the conclusions of the commission which he, as its chairman, submitted to the Senate at the opening of the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. This report is at once a masterpiece of sustained argument and a powerful appeal to the patriotic spirit of the American people. It is but a simple statement of truth to say that if the recommendations therein contained had found expression in the legislation suggested and which Senator GALLINGER later introduced in the Senate and strongly advocated America would not have found herself in the humiliating and defenseless position on the seas that characterized her entrance into the European war.

As no man in the history of our State ever represented her in Congress for so long a period, so it may also truthfully be said that no man ever served New Hampshire in any capacity with a greater industry, loyalty, or devotion than Senator GALLINGER. Nothing that affected the State, its institutions, or its people in any degree was too trivial to receive his painstaking and earnest consideration. Any enterprise that seemed to him to be in the interest of New Hampshire was sure to receive his strong and loyal support. I suppose, for instance, that no man in our public life had done more than he to improve our beautiful harbor at Portsmouth and the navy yard located at the same place. Indeed, one of the very last acts of Senator GALLINGER'S official life was to move an amendment to the naval bill in the Senate providing for an additional dry dock at the Portsmouth Navy Yard.

Some one has said that all associated action among men exhibits an inevitable conflict between the idea of combined efficiency and the idea of individual freedom. Neither can prevail without some sacrifice of the other. The difference is temperamental and the two types of character are hard to reconcile.

Senator GALLINGER belonged to the type which seeks efficiency by the law of its nature. All of his instincts were for order, discipline, intelligent direction, voluntary subordination to a common purpose. That explains, in my judgment, why in politics, from first to last, he was always for party organization and party responsibility. Certainly he was always a staunch party man. He had the capacity for sympathetic appreciation of the feelings and motives of others and that, as we all know, is what makes associated action easy. He thought much of the common cause in which he was enlisted and little of his own advantage. He was simple and direct in thought and action and frank and truthful and entirely free from that cowardice which breeds deception.

Personally, he was one of the most lovable men I have ever known—a loyal friend and charming companion and an affectionate husband and father. His sympathies were broad and generous. He was fond of music and flowers and literature and the companionship of little children. He loved the fields and hills and woods, and through most of his active career found greatest relaxation and rest in the "house by the side of the road," on the little Salisbury farm. There he took the keenest pleasure in the management and betterment of his property. Only last year he drove a deep artesian well on this farm and set out a large number of young apple trees of a special variety that he had been at great pains to secure in a western State. He fully expected to "round out a century," as he expressed it, and watch his new orchard in its development. His motto throughout life seemed to be "Act as if you were to live forever—live as if you were to die to-morrow." Sorrow came to him, but he met it manfully. It neither embittered nor crushed him. He was a popular type of the American optimist, imparting confidence and enthusiasm to all who came within the influence of his delightful personality. His course was a steadfast and consistent one throughout his whole public career. His convictions were strong and he held them strongly.

I think it was James A. Garfield who said in substance that in the minds of most men the kingdom of opinion is divided into three territories—the territory of yes, the territory of no, and a broad unexplored middle ground of doubt. That middle ground in the mind of Senator GALLINGER was very narrow. Nearly all his territory was occupied by positive convictions. On most questions his mind was made up more completely than that of almost any man I have ever known.

On his 81st birthday he said in the Senate, in the course of some remarks appropriate to the occasion:

> I have had no controversy during the 27 years of my membership in the Senate with any Senator that lasted overnight.

This would explain why, although from first to last as I have stated, he was a strong party man, Senator GALLINGER had the warm friendship and even affection of men long associated with him in Congress who differed radically with him in political belief. As illustrating what I have just said, I want to quote a few words from some remarks made by Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, a prominent Democratic Senator, on the occasion of Senator GALLINGER'S 81st birthday.

Senator WILLIAMS said:

> I have never known a sweeter person, a man who was more of a real man, honest, true, faithful, and brave in the entertainment and expression of opinion, than the Senator from New Hampshire. When a partially reconstructed rebel can say that about a down-east Yankee, that ought to go pretty far.
> I have served with him on committees, I have served with him in this body, and I have never yet seen the day, as far apart as he and I were and are politically, when a statement of his about a matter of fact did not carry with me absolute verity, not verisimilitude, as statements of that sort coming from Representatives and Senators generally do, but absolute verity. I would no more doubt his word, I would no more doubt his integrity, intellectual or moral, than I would doubt my own.
> Mr. President, my temperament is such that I either love men or hate them; nobody is indifferent to me. I hate men when I hate them because I think they are untrue. I think they are insincere, I think that they camouflage; and I love men when I love them because I think they are true and do not camouflage and are not insincere. I love an open enemy who fights me to the hilt of the dagger very much more than I love a fellow with velvet gloves who seeks an aperture under my fifth rib without advising me beforehand that he is going to seek it. I think that Senator GALLINGER falls within the lines of the people whom I love and whom I have a right to love and do love, because they are honest and because I try to be honest."

The accident of birth in another country precluded him from aspirations to the highest honors in the land of his adoption, but for several years he had been the acknowledged leader of his party in the Senate, where he had met the exacting duties of this high and responsible position with dignity, distinction, and to the general satisfaction of his associates in that body.

Although born in Canada and on his father's side of German parentage, never was there so much as a whisper of suspicion of his thorough-going and stalwart Americanism. Indeed, it was that spirit that seemed to give motive and inspiration to his whole public career. Always his argument for a protective tariff came back to the fundamental proposition that the American wage scale and American standards of living must at all hazards be maintained. It was the same in regard to the merchant marine. His whole being seemed to revolt at the idea of America remaining for another moment in a humiliating position of dependence upon foreign governments and foreign shipowners in our overseas trade. Although never a "jingo" in any sense of the word, he was not a pacifist as the term is now understood. He hated war, as I believe most right-minded men do, but that did not carry him to the extent of being willing to go to any length or pay any price in order to maintain peace. He stood for a policy of reasonable preparedness long before the European war broke out. It was in no spirit of enthusiasm, but rather with sorrow, because he saw no other honorable course, that he voted for the declaration of war with Germany. After the war came, no man in either branch of Congress stood more stoutly than he for its vigorous prosecution to complete victory.

It was due in no small degree to his wise counsel and leadership that throughout the war his party in Congress gave loyal and whole-hearted support to the Government upon all war measures. Had he lived to see that glad November morning, when once again across the darkened skies shot the bright rays of coming peace, there would have been no man within the confines of this great Republic whose heart would have leaped with greater joy than his at the happy consummation.

There are many phases of his life and public service of which I would like to speak, especially of his zealous and painstaking efforts for the upbuilding, beautifying, and civic betterment of this capital city, whose citizens of all classes had come to have for him a genuine and true affection; of his unflagging interest in and valuable service to the Union soldiers—veterans of the Civil War—with whom his name is a household word from one end of the land to the other; of his sincere belief in and strong advocacy of prohibition and equal suffrage in days when these causes were less popular and it took more courage to stand for them than now. But I will not say more. Most of these subjects have already been covered, and all, I am sure, will be covered by other speakers, who have had the advantage of a more intimate association than I with Senator GALLINGER during the many years of his congressional career.

Reviewing his life and summing up his qualities, I know of no words that may more fittingly be applied to him than those he himself spoke on a similar occasion of his long-time friend, Hon. James S. Sherman, former Vice President of the United States:

He was in the truest sense a patriot, loving his country and its institutions, and devoted to the happiness and welfare of all classes of its people. He was broad minded and large hearted, incapable of a meanness, and filled with sympathy and love for his fellows. Such a life surely did not end when death came. Rather let us believe that it was the beginning of a higher and better existence, and that the earthly activities of our friend were but the prelude to a life of greater beauty, of grander aspirations, and of nobler achievements.

It seems to me that the philosophy of Senator GALLINGER'S life is nowhere better expressed than in the beautiful lines of Henry Van Dyke:

Let me but live my life from year to year
With forward face and unreluctant soul,
Not hastening to, nor turning from, the goal;
Not mourning for the things that disappear
In the dim past, nor holding back in fear
From what the future veils; but with a whole
And happy heart, that pays its toll
To Youth and Age, and travels on with cheer.
So let the way wind up the hill or down,
Though rough or smooth, the journey will be joy;
Still seeking what I sought when but a boy,
New friendship, high adventure, and a crown.
I shall grow old, but never lose life's zest,
Because the road's last turn will be the best.

Mr. WOODS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the resolution offered I feel that I voice the sentiment of the great liberty-loving people of the Central West in saying that they regret deeply the death of Senator GALLINGER and are united in honoring his memory.

Senator GALLINGER served well the people of his State. He did more, he served the people of every State in the Union. He founded that service on truth, righteousness, and a belief in equal treatment to all. His simple faith knew no distinction between the lofty and the lowly. He was the Republican leader of the Senate, not for New England only, but for the entire country as well. His counsel was keeping his party free alike from the snare of government by centralized autocratic bureaucracy and the delusion of anarchy inspired by the belief that liberty and rights of citizens can be protected without government.

By training and experience Senator GALLINGER was especially fitted to render impartial and unprejudiced public service. The 81 years he lived spanned the interval between a Nation staggering under the menace of disunion and a Nation mighty in the perfect unity and singleness of purpose which he helped to maintain.

During that interval he toiled to harmonize the discordant elements among the people of his country. He was not one of those who made patriotism an excuse for brutal excesses or arbitrary tyranny. Patriotism with him meant greater love of home, greater love of humanity and the ultimate brotherhood of man. It is therefore peculiarly fitting that on this Sabbath day we rest from our legislative work to do him honor.

Senator GALLINGER stood apart from those who believe that government can do no wrong, and while in other countries that element has decreased in recent years, in our own country their numbers have increased. They are dangerous in any country, and if predominant will destroy any form of government where the people rule. They may leave the shadow, but the substance of self-government—individual liberty and the rights of citizens—will be gradually lost.

The greatest public officials are true servants of the people, faithful to that ideal. They do not ride the wave of thoughtless popular approval, but steadfastly pursue that course which serves the permanent interests of all. Senator GALLINGER stood firmly for the inalienable sovereignty of the people and their inherent rights. He was conspicuous in abiding by the principle that government should exist for the sake of the people and not the people for the sake of the government, and that the holders of capital also should be wage earners and wage earners holders of capital.

Success crowned his public career, a success that is shared by every citizen of the United States, because it was founded on service for others. Believing that public office was merely a greater opportunity for larger service to the people, Senator GALLINGER was a leader to be loved and trusted. It is through the influence of such men that representative government, that liberty, that freedom of speech and press are maintained.

He believed that the producers of the world's wealth, not the spenders and manipulators of wealth, should direct the conduct of national affairs. He lived and worked to conserve and improve the political, economic, and social structure of the Nation. Always he opposed unbridled license, and with strength and patience fought to maintain the liberty of the people under the Constitution.

His final resting place is in the hills of New Hampshire that he loved, and ever will be held in tender memory and respect not only by those who knew him as a neighbor and friend but also by a Nation which knows the impress of his strength of character, his magnanimity, his self-control, and his fidelity to high principle and duty throughout a lifelong public career.

SENATE.

The Chaplain, the Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that in this great spiritual empire we have learned to think of national values in terms of Thy law, that that which is dear to us is related to Thy kingdom, and that the goal of our national life is the establishment of the kingdom of truth and righteousness among men. As we come again to address ourselves to the tasks of the day we invoke Thy blessing, that the spirit of God may guide us in the discharge of the duties of the day, and that at its close we may have the comfortable satisfaction of having fulfilled God's will in us. We ask now Thy blessing. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, January 14, 1919, when, on request of Mr. SHEPPARD and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALDER. I present a memorial of the Legislature of the State of New York addressed to the Senate of the United States, touching Federal woman suffrage. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE.
Albany, January 13, 1919.

Whereas the women's suffrage amendment has long been pending before the United States Senate; and
Whereas this amendment has been passed by the House of Representatives; and
Whereas by an overwhelming majority the citizens of New York State have enfranchised New York State women; and
Whereas the women of the United States have rendered devoted and patriotic service during the trying period of the war; and
Whereas the great governmental, industrial, and social progress before this country is of the deepest interest to women citizens as well as to men: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That we urge the two United States Senators from New York State to do everything in their power to secure the passage of the Federal amendment in the Senate; and

We furthermore express our earnest hope that the United States Senate as a body will give the two-thirds vote necessary to pass the Federal amendment for ratification by the various State legislatures at once.

By order of the senate:

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

In assembly: January 15, 1919. Concurred in without amendment.
By order of the assembly:

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

Mr. CALDER. I also present a petition of the Traffic Club of New York, urging the early return of the transportation systems of the country to the control and management of their owners. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KIRBY. I present a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, asking the Senate and House to pass the Federal amendment permitting woman suffrage. This resolution was passed by unanimous vote by the two houses of the Arkansas Legislature and shows the unanimity of sentiment there. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

Whereas the Federal amendment for woman suffrage has passed the lower House of Congress and is pending in the Senate; and
Whereas President Wilson, in a notable address, urged the Senate to pass this measure as an essential part of the great program of world democracy and in recognition of the signal services rendered by women throughout the war; and
Whereas we recognize the right, justice, and expediency of this measure: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the Forty-second General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, in regular session assembled, memorialize the United States Senate to pass the Federal amendment for woman suffrage at once, that the several legislatures now in session may be given the opportunity to ratify the same.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senators ROBINSON and KIRBY, with the request that they be read into the RECORD.

Mr. STERLING. I present a Senate concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota relating to the enactment of the woman suffrage amendment. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

CERTIFICATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE.

I, C. A. Burkhart, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the annexed senate concurrent resolution was duly passed by the Sixteenth Session of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of South Dakota, at the city of Pierre, January 13, 1919.

[SEAL.] C. A. BURKHART,
Secretary of State.

Senate concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), Believing that the staunch patriotism and indispensable services of our mothers, wives, and daughters during the prosecution of the war entitles these noble women to all the rights and privileges a grateful country can bestow, we urgently request the Senate of the United States to immediately adopt the national suffrage amendment; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Hon. THOMAS STERLING and to the Hon. EDWIN S. JOHNSON, with the request that it be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. STERLING. I also present resolutions and a memorial of the Farmers' Equity Union Creamery and Mercantile Exchange, covering a number of subjects, such as the President's efforts to prevent future wars, cooperation with the Food Administration, and relating also to Federal railroad control for the period of five years. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions and memorial adopted by the Farmers' Equity Union Creamery and Mercantile Exchange in convention assembled at Aberdeen, S. Dak., January 14 and 15, 1919:

We, the resolution committee, beg to report the following resolutions:

Whereas we realize that our beloved President is engaged in the most momentous undertaking in all history, we pledge to him our undivided support, especially in his effort to prevent future wars.

To the Food Administration and the Government reconstruction work we continue to offer our full cooperation.

We believe that Congress should try to relieve the uncertainty existing between Federal and State laws, whereby both State and Federal antidiscrimination laws become a partial failure.

Whereas the United States Government has taken over and now has control of the operation of the railways; and

Whereas we believe such action to be to the advantage of the Nation and to the producers therein, from both a military and economic standpoint: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we heartily indorse the recommendation of the Director General of Railways that railways, telegraph and express companies remain under Federal control for five years, so a fair test may be given Government control and also for the steadying effect it will have upon the industrial fabric of the Nation during reconstruction.

H. A. MELGAARD,
R. C. CHRISTENSEN,
GEO. N. MILLER,
Committee.

Whereas the people have passed the constitutional amendments, we pledge our undivided support in developing them.
Whereas the constitutional amendment relative to state assuming control of the possibilities of the Missouri River for power was carried at the last general election—

Resolved, That we approve and favor a survey to determine the feasibility of the development of the Missouri River, and in the event such development appears feasible the development thereof by joint action of the Federal Government and the several States through which the Missouri River flows, to the end that the ownership, control, and operation shall be retained by the governments so cooperating.

H. A. MELGAARD,
R. C. CHRISTENSEN,
GEO. N. MILLER,

CLAIM OF MARCUS P. NORTON.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 127) for the adjudication and determination of the claims arising under joint resolution of July 14, 1870, authorizing the Postmaster General to continue in use in the Postal Service Marcus P. Norton's combined postmarking and stamp-canceling hand stamp patents, or otherwise, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 653) thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ELDORADO, KANS.

Mr. CURTIS. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12881) to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans., and I submit a report (No. 652) thereon. The bill merely authorizes an increase in the limit of cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans., by $35,000. The population of Eldorado has grown from 3,500, when the original bill was passed, to 18,000. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SHEPPARD. What is the request?

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It proposes to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans., by $35,000. As I have said, the town has increased in population from 3,500, when the original bill was passed, to 18,000 now. The bill is recommended by the department and has been unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have no objection to the bill; but I gave notice last week that I would object to any variation of the regular order on Calendar Monday. Inasmuch, however, as I did not object to taking up the potash question, I shall make an exception in the case of the Senator from Kansas, and also in the case of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], but after that I shall endeavor to enforce the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Kansas?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the acquisition by purchase or otherwise of a site and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other Government offices at Eldorado, Kans., be and the same is hereby, amended so as to increase the limit of cost for said building from $60,000 to $95,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINING CLAIMS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HENDERSON. From the Committee on Mines and Mining I report back favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 198) to suspend the doing of assessment work on mining claims in Alaska for the years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, and extending to that Territory the provisions of public resolution No. 10, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved July 17, 1917, and public resolution No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved October 5, 1917, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 651) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 7, after the word "seventeen," to insert "and amendments thereto"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "eighteen," to insert "and"; in line 3, after the word "nineteen," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "and nineteen hundred and twenty"; and in line 15, after the word "seventeen," to insert "and amendments thereto," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of public resolution No. 10, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved July 17, 1917, and the provisions of public resolution No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved October 5, 1917, and amendments thereto, be, and they are hereby, extended to the Territory of Alaska. The laws requiring assessment work to be made upon mining claims in the Territory of Alaska for the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 are hereby suspended for such period; and no forfeiture or relocation of any mining claim or mining location in said Territory shall be permitted or adjudged for failure to do or have done the annual assessment work thereon for either of said years; and no mining claim or location therein shall be held to be forfeited or subject to relocation for any failure to have done the annual assessment work thereon where the owner or anyone for him complied with the provisions of public resolution No. 10, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved July 17, 1917, or public resolution No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved October 5, 1917, and amendments thereto.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to suspend the legal requirements of assessment work on mining claims in Alaska for the years 1917, 1918, and 1919, and extending to that Territory the provisions of public resolution No. 10, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved July 17, 1917, and public resolution No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved October 5, 1917, as amended, and for other purposes."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LENROOT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to give the consent of Congress for the removal of restrictions on alienation of Indian lands by the Legislature of the State of Washington pursuant to treaties with the Indians of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING submitted an amendment providing that all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors shall be included in the promotion of training and instruction by the public schools authorized by subdivision 9 of section 1 of the act of May 9, 1918, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PUBLICITY OF DEPARTMENTAL ACTIVITIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution (S. Res. 419) was read and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved, That the newspapers, magazines, and other instrumentalities of a free press serve adequately all publicity purposes in the transmission of news and its communication to the public; that the practice which has developed of various Government departments of publishing what is in effect a newspaper or a periodical which ostensibly reports to the public news from that department has become a system of promoting various economic proposals, schemes for extending the power of the department or bureau concerned, and securing increased appropriations; it is a menace to the free press of the country, a burden to the taxpayer thereof, and serves no useful purpose in promoting efficient, economic, or sound principles of government.

Resolved further, That the Senate Committee on Printing be, and is hereby, directed to investigate the number of such periodicals or papers published by the departments, bureaus, boards, and commissions, the number of persons employed therein, and the estimated cost of the same, and report such matter to the Senate for its further consideration.

ADDRESSES AT OPENING OF PEACE CONFERENCE.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 420), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the following be printed as a public document, to wit:

(1) Address by President Raymond Poincare, of France, at the opening session of the peace conference in Paris January 18, 1919.

(2) Address of Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America.

(3) Address of David Lloyd George, prime minister of Great Britain.

(4) Address of Baron Sonnino, foreign minister of Italy.

(5) Address of Georges Clemenceau, premier of France, accepting the presidency of the council.

CONSCRIPTION OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present a communication from Hannis Taylor, of Washington, D. C., an inquiry on the writ of habeas corpus, whether it has been practically suspended or not. I should like to have the two papers printed at length but not read. I consider it a very material inquiry under present conditions.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: It is a comfort to me to know that you feel a deep concern for our suffering soldiers now employed on police duty in Russia. There will soon be an imperious demand from the American people that all conscripted soldiers so employed anywhere in Europe be returned immediately to their homes. The last notable outcry of the fearless and lamented Col. Roosevelt gave eloquent expression to that demand. Would not the desired end be greatly advanced if the fact could be emphasized that all of our conscripted soldiers now in Europe are held there in open violation of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution?

I inclose an open letter to the Secretary of War, giving my reasons for that conclusion, which a censored press is withholding from the American people, who have a right, at least, to read and consider it. As our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is now our only uncensored journal, will you be good enough to have that open letter, together with this, inserted in the RECORD. In that way you will be relieved entirely of any responsibility for any views I have expressed. I simply ask that the American people be given a chance to consider a matter in which the hearts and homes of many of them are deeply involved.

The Robert Cox referred to in the open letter is a young man taken by conscription from the ranks of our laboring people, who has not been heard from since March 28, 1918. His anxious father and mother have written continuously without results to the address given to them by The Adjutant General's office. I inclose four letters returned to them because their son could not be found at the address so given. To my urgent letter to the Secretary of War, dated December 21, 1918, no reply whatever has been made. Will you be good enough to aid me in the effort to ascertain from the War Department whether Robert Cox is living or dead, so that his father and mother may know the truth. With great respect,

Sincerely, yours,

HANNIS TAYLOR.

CONSCRIPTION OF OUR LABORING MASSES FOR SERVICE ABROAD MUST END AT ONCE AND FOREVER.

Prior to the present war both the English and American constitutions were able to protect the laboring masses against a conscription that drags them to foreign battle fields, where they must fight and die far from home. At the end of the first and only suspension of the immunity that has ever occurred in Great Britain, its prime minister has been forced to covenant at the polls that the experiment shall never be repeated there. At the end of our first and only suspension of the immunity, so costly in life and treasure, our laboring masses now demand that the experiment shall never be repeated here. The peace of the world can never be reestablished until conscription is limited, as our Constitution provides, to home defense. In that way the assembling of great armies on foreign soils will be made impossible; in that way will end all babbling as to the empty dream called the league of nations, ridiculed and abandoned by all sound thinkers as a chimera since it was first definitely formulated by the Abbé St. Pierre in 1713.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

In the matter of Robert Cox, a member of the National Militia (unlawfully styled the National Army), who, after having been lawfully conscripted for home defense, was unlawfully and secretly transported by the War Department from Camp Funston, in the State of Kansas, to the battle fields of Europe, at a time when he was being held for trial in the Supreme Court of the United States under the sacred writ of habeas corpus.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 21, 1918.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

SIR: The caption of this letter will remind you at once of the gravest and most far-reaching violation of the sacred writ of habeas corpus that has ever occurred in the history of English and American law since the passage of the habeas corpus act of 1679 (31 Car. II, ch. 2), entitled "An act for the better securing the liberty of the subject, and for the prevention of imprisonments beyond seas." That grave statement is intended to emphasize the fact that the unlawful transportation of Robert Cox by the military power beyond the territorial limits of the United States to European battle fields, while he was waiting for a hearing in the Supreme Court under a writ of habeas corpus, deprived that court of all jurisdiction to decide said cause, and of all power to uphold the ancient constitutional immunity from service abroad upon which the lives and limbs of hundreds of thousands of American citizens (since forced to die and suffer wounds in foreign lands) then depended.

You may be under the erroneous impression that on May 6, 1918, in a certain paper read by his honor, the Chief Justice, the Supreme Court of the United States passed adversely upon the contention of Robert Cox that section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, under which he was lawfully conscripted for home defense, expressly exempted him from military service beyond the territorial limits of the United States. No such judgment was rendered, either in law or in fact, for the simple and conclusive reason that for at least six weeks before May 6, 1918, said court had lost all jurisdiction over the person of said Cox by reason of his unlawful and secret transportation by the military power to the battle fields of France, where he was then held by such power when his case was called for hearing in said court. Fortunately there can be no possible controversy as to these facts, because after said cause had been called for hearing, such facts were confessed in open court, in the presence of the nine justices, by the Solicitor General, after they had been stated to the court by the counsel for said Cox. The statement has been made that the transportation of said Cox beyond the jurisdiction of said court was secret, because his family, his counsel, and the court itself, so far as we know, were all kept in profound ignorance of the same until a post card was received from him from France announcing his arrival there.

From the foundation of the Supreme Court the elementary principle has been asserted in endless forms that as a court of limited and defined powers it can not pronounce judgment in any case over which it has no jurisdiction. It is equally well settled that no judgment can be rendered in any case, once before it, after the court has, by subsequent events, lost jurisdiction of it. In Mills v. Green (159 U. S., 651) the court said: "The duty of this court, as of every other judicial tribunal, is to decide actual controversies by a judgment which can be carried into effect and not to give opinions upon moot questions or abstract propositions or to declare principles or rules of law which can not affect the matter in issue in the case before it. It necessarily follows that when, pending an appeal from the judgment of the lower court, and without any fault of the defendant, an event occurs which renders it impossible for this court, if it should decide the case in favor of the plaintiff, to grant him any effectual relief whatever the court will not proceed to a formal judgment, but will dismiss the appeal."

Without any fault upon the part of Robert Cox, he had been secretly and unlawfully removed by the military power from the custody of said court while he was being held under the sacred writ of habeas corpus for a hearing therein. At the time his case was called for trial, and on May 6, 1918, when his honor, the Chief Justice, read from the bench a certain paper, purporting to be a judgment wiping out the ancient constitutional immunity from service abroad set up by said Cox, he was in the custody of the American Army in France, entirely beyond the jurisdiction and process of said court. If the court had decided in his favor it would have been entirely powerless to enforce its decree against the military power in France then holding the petitioner for the writ in that country in open and flagrant contempt of its jurisdiction.

As it appears from its own decisions, in a form too clear for cavil, quibble, or question, that the Supreme Court has rendered no judgment adverse to the ancient constitutional immunity from service abroad set up by Robert Cox, the fact remains that such ancient immunity still stands unimpaired as a part of the fundamental law. After such immunity had endured for a thousand years, as a corner stone of the English constitution, it was incorporated into our own as a part of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution of 1789, a fact fixed by Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19), a case never questioned or overruled. When during the War of 1812 an appeal was mode to Congress to connive at the destruction of the immunity in question, in order that our National Militia might be taken over into Canada, the conspiracy was crushed by Daniel Webster in an immortal oration in which he declared that the death of any American citizen who might be forced by conscription to die abroad would be "murder."

When a more recent attempt was made by men disloyal to the Constitution to assail the immunity in question in order to force American citizens by conscription to render military service in Cuba and the Philippines, President Taft, with Attorney General George W. Wickersham at his side, stood forth manfully as a defender of the ancient immunity. Through their joint efforts the attempt to force American citizens to render military service in either of those islands was trampled under foot. In an official opinion delivered under his solemn oath of office on February 17, 1912, that Attorney General, then considered a sound lawyer, declared that "Congress can not by its own enactment enlarge the power conferred upon it by the Constitution; and if this provision were construed to authorize Congress to use the Organized Militia for any other than the three purposes specified, it would be unconstitutional."

Mr. Secretary, if Congress has no power to authorize the President, as Commander in Chief, or you as Secretary of War, to send a single member of the conscripted National Militia to foreign battle fields, certainly neither of you can do so in open defiance of section 8, Article I, as construed in Martin against Mott, declared by Attorney General Wickersham to be the "law of the land." Since February 17, 1912, his sound and unanswerable opinion in favor of the immunity in question, unshaken by his pitiful attempts at recantation, has been and is to-day the law of the Department of Justice. As such it was solemnly recognized and affirmed by President Wilson in four speeches delivered in January and February, 1916. I have them in print before me. Thus the ancient immunity from service abroad upon which the case of Robert Cox depended was solemnly affirmed down to 1916 by the Supreme Court of the United States, by Daniel Webster, by President Taft, and Attorney General Wickersham and by President Wilson himself through all the solemn sanctions recognized by honorable men who respect what Mr. Grote has called "constitutional morality." Even Gen. Leonard Wood, the defendant in the case of Robert Cox, published in 1916 a book entitled "Our Military History, Its Facts and Fallacies," in which he vigorously defends the immunity from service abroad upon which Cox's case depended. It is a sad thing to see the passions of war deprive men in high places of their reason.

Frankness requires that we should thus impress upon you what is to-day the "law of the land" upon this all-important subject, because it will be our duty, as counsel for Robert Cox, to present to this Congress and to the next, if necessary, this statement of his case, to the end that a thorough investigation may be made by that body, which will settle the fact that not only Robert Cox but all other conscripted members of the National Militia now held in military bondage in foreign lands are held there and their lives jeopardized there, in open and flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States. You have no judicial decision, no authority from Congress, no authority from the American people in the form of law which authorizes you to hold a single member of the National Militia for a single day beyond the territorial limits of the United States. The cruel exposure of our National Militia to the horrors of a Russian winter, if they shall be there employed in police duty, will be without the shadow of legality. We protest against the employment of Robert Cox in any such service. At this critical moment in the world's history, when the prime minister of England has been forced at the polls to promise the laboring masses of that country to reestablish at once the ancient immunity from military service abroad, is it not high time for a like guaranty to be given to the laboring masses from whose ranks, as you well know, the bulk of our conscripts has been drawn. The new-fangled and revolutionary idea that raw and untrained citizen soldiers may be dragged from their homes to die on foreign battle fields in quarrels only indirectly their own has always been condemned, as we have said already, both by the English and American Constitutions.

The unauthorized transportation by the executive power of our conscripted National Militia to the battle fields of Europe, in defiance of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, will stand out in the time to come as the most stupendous act of illegality in all history.

When our honored Supreme Court, in the Conscription cases, delivered a wise and just judgment, settling the fact that all citizens of lawful age may be conscripted by Congress, under section 8, Article I, for home defense, the defensive military power of this Republic was greatly strengthened, with the cordial approval of all patriotic and law-loving men. But when in the subsequent case of Robert Cox its hand was stayed through a lack of jurisdiction, as it attempted to sweep away the ancient and firmly settled immunity of the National Militia from service abroad, who can doubt that the Constitution was shielded by Providence from what would have been a mortal wound. If any doubt has heretofore existed on that point, the recent reestablishment of the ancient immunity in the land of its birth—from which we borrowed it—and the repudiation by "responsible English statesmen" of the deadly experiment that followed its abolition, should warn all of our rulers that no second attempt to abolish it must be made here, except by the process of amendment which the Constitution provides. This sacred immunity can not be abolished by the executive power; it can not be abolished by the judicial power, nor by both acting in concert. The right of abolition has never been delegated; it belongs to the American people alone.

As a responsible statesman specially charged with the guardianship of our military system, you must know, Mr. Secretary, that the burning question of the hour soon will be this: Shall our conscripted National Militia be detained indefinitely in Europe, in defiance of the Constitution, as a police force to hold in bondage the new-born democracies whose growth we are supposed to promote? If the life of one or more of such democracies shall be threatened with ruin through the imposition of such enormous indemnities as will shock the conscience of our Christian civilization, are American citizen-soldiers from the banks of the Hudson, the Ohio, and the Mississippi to be made the tax gatherers of such exactions in which we have no share? Upon that question of questions our future relations to European politics now depends. If we will only accept the prime minister of England's wise and patriotic declaration that service abroad by conscription is at end, the dawn will begin to break, the repudiated Monroe doctrine, so honored by our fathers, will be reestablished, and our Republic rescued from the "Cæsarian mania" that has nearly taken its life.

The startling outcome of the great war is the complete overthrow of the concert of Europe which for nearly three centuries has guarded the European balance of power. Out of its ruins has risen already a perfectly organized league of nations, the only one that will be created, a new holy alliance composed of the British Empire and its allies (not ours)—France, Italy, and Japan—whose irresistible sea power now encircles the earth. Collier's Weekly says: "That August day, 1914, when the war broke out, the British Navy had a tonnage of 2,500,000 and a personnel of 145,000 officers and men. To-day it has a tonnage (including the auxiliary fleet) of 8,000,000 and a personnel of almost 500,000. This does not include the mercantile marine or patrol vessels, mine sweepers, etc., in the auxiliary fleet. There are 50,000 men serving in these." In addition, the British Empire holds in its hands the surrendered German fleet, the German colonies, and the long-coveted Dardanelles, besides the Suez Canal and a kind of overlordship over our own Panama Canal, which can be defended only by sea power. When to all that is added the combined sea power of her allies—France, Italy, and Japan—she is not only the mistress of the seas but the empress of the world in a way in which no world power has ever been since the fall of the Roman Empire.

With such a mighty combination against us, with which we are not in alliance, the Secretary of the Navy and yourself are performing a highly patriotic duty in providing for the national defense. Under the heading "The Postwar Budget" the Washington Post has said: "The War Department asks for $2,556,000,000 with which to bring the Army home from Europe and to maintain such a force in Europe as conditions render necessary, in addition to providing fortifications and other features of the Military Establishment. The Navy Department asks for $2,650,000,000, a large portion of which is for the purpose of building up the great Navy which it is proposed that the United States shall maintain. The big-navy program was given unqualified indorsement by the President in his address to Congress."

The imminence of the peril has just been confessed by the confidential adviser and official mouthpiece of the President, Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, who, after stating that Germany "can not in 50 years have a new navy that can oppose Britain," makes an urgent public appeal for an independent American Navy that can compete with that of England on equal terms. Every schoolboy must now understand that the overthrow of Germany—our only real bulwark against Great Britain—will impose upon us an annual burden of at least two thousand millions as a defense fund against the new and imperial mistress of the world. The appalling situation can not longer be concealed from the American people by the "smoke screen" called "the league of nations."

Our naval and military experts perfectly understand that until the concert of Europe can be reestablished we must bear alone the crushing burden of defense against the world-encircling sea power of the British Empire, which never gives up anything, never yields anything except to superior force. With the central empires, Russia, and Turkey eliminated, with France, Italy, and Japan as her allies, the triumphant and defiant mistress of the world now beholds us without an ally, and with a tremendous debt contracted largely for her salvation. Such is the outcome of our first brilliant experiment in world diplomacy. Let us not forget that Cicero said that "supreme power belongs to him who gains the command of the sea."

Thus the great war has lifted us to a perilous eminence—we are to be the greatest tax-bearing nation on earth. Instead of an annual expenditure of $1,000,000,000 we must now provide an annual expenditure of at least $5,000,000,000 if the Secretary of the Navy and yourself are to be upheld. Under such conditions is it not wise for us to withdraw at once from Europe our entire national militia, including Robert Cox, so that they may be used, if necessary, for home defense? Can we with prudence further weaken our financial resources—our only real hope—by lending another dollar to the European powers already united in a European league of nations whose secret conferences have settled in advance every serious question upon which the peace congress will be called upon to pass? If we go on dreaming and giving, will not the statesmen of Downing Street soon feel that they are dealing with children who can be satisfied with sweetmeats and a few bouquets?

We perfectly understand the danger incurred by any American citizen who dares to defend American interests when they conflict with those of the Holy Alliance, whose unofficial envoys swarm in this Capital, and whose propaganda largely controls public opinion through a powerful section of the American press pledged to its interests. For defending the sacred clause of the Constitution involved in the case of Robert Cox we were denounced and hounded by certain disloyal men who dare to contend that it is a crime even to defend the Constitution of the United States whenever it happens to conflict with foreign and imperial interests. But since conscription for service abroad—the corner stone of the Prussian military system, invented in Germany by Scharnhaus and denounced by Mr. Lloyd George—is soon to be branded as a menace to the peace of the world by the coming peace congress, possibly the foreign propaganda may permit it to be mentioned unfavorably in the United States, by whose Constitution it has always been bitterly condemned and expressly prohibited.

In conclusion, permit us to present to you a copy of a letter from the father of Robert Cox, a coal miner of Missouri, who does not know whether his boy is living or dead. If he has perished, certainly his family are entitled to know the fact. His father says in his letter that neither his mother nor himself have been able to hear from their son since the 28th of March, 1918. "We have repeatedly written to him, writing each week, some of which are returned to us, others not." The father also desires to know whether his son "is carrying effective war insurance."

Will you be good enough to answer these questions at an early day, so that these poor laboring people may know the fate of their son?

With profound respect, Mr. Secretary, your obedient servants,

HANNIS TAYLOR,
JOSEPH E. BLACK,
Counsel for Robert Cox.

VIEWS OF JEFFERSON STANLEY.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a letter from a citizen and old soldier in my State, which I wish to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

LET THEM COME HOME.

MILNOR, N. DAK., January 6, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My son and a neighbor canvassed Sydna for the last Red Cross drive, and while so doing asked the opinion of the voters as to compulsory military training. The unanimous answer was "No; we don't want it."

I am a "vet" of the Civil War. I have three boys in this war; one was proprietor of a horse ranch in Canada. He was compelled to turn over his stock to irresponsible parties and will lose one-half. Another was fireman on the G. N. R. R., receiving not less than $125 per month. The youngest enlisted in the Marines and was in every fight from the Marne to the finish. He has two medals as expert rifleman; he did duty as a sniper and was in charge of a machine gun when wounded. The last day but one before hostilities ceased his company was in it bad. The captain called for volunteers to hold the line while he could re-form the company. Robert and seven other machine-gun men stepped to the front. They held the Hun all right, and the fight was won for the United States Marines, for which the whole eight were lined up and a French general, after kissing each on both cheeks, pinned the French cross of honor on the lapels of their coats. My son received three wounds, but stayed and worked his gun until the captain, seeing his wound, ordered him to the rear. He is all right now and will be home soon, but will not have much use of his left hand.

I am not writing this to boost my boys. They are only just fair samples of all the boys over there.

I do not favor intervention in Russian affairs. They listened to German propaganda and lay down when most needed. Now let them help themselves as best they can.

Let the boys come home.

Very respectfully,

JEFFERSON STANLEY.

ADDRESSES AT OPENING OF PEACE CONFERENCE.

Mr. McKELLAR. On Saturday in opening the peace conference in Paris President Poincare made a very important speech, it seems to me, that referred, in part, to the league of nations. This is a splendid speech, well worthy of being preserved in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent to have that speech printed in the RECORD, together with the replies by Monsieur Clemenceau, President Wilson, and Mr. Lloyd George. I would ask that Mr. Orlando's speech be printed, too, but I have been unable to find a copy of it. That minister made a speech on the same occasion along similar lines with the others. The French President shows very conclusively that there is a spirit of cooperation among our peace delegates and as well shows that President Wilson's proposals have virtually been, tentatively at least, agreed upon by the representatives of the great powers. Mr. Clemenceau's speech indicates that his opposition to the league has been withdrawn. The silence of the others shows, as I believe, a substantial agreement on all these proposals of our President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not hear the request of the Senator from Tennessee. Will the Senator state again what his request was?

Mr. McKELLAR. The request was to print in the RECORD, without reading, a short address from President Poincare, together with the replies of President Wilson, Monsieur Clemenceau, and Mr. Lloyd George. They are all very short.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S SUPREME JUDGMENT.

"The intervention of the United States was something more, something greater, than a great political and military event. It was a supreme judgment passed at the bar of history by the lofty conscience of a free people and their Chief Magistrate on the enormous responsibilities incurred in the frightful conflict which was lacerating humanity." (From President Poincare's address at opening of the peace congress.)

ENEMIES SEEK IN VAIN TO SPLIT ALLIED UNITY, SAYS M. POINCARE.

PARIS, January 18.

President Poincare's speech at the opening of the peace conference was as follows:

"Gentlemen, France greets and thanks you for having chosen as the seat of your labors the city which for more than four years the enemy had made his principal military objective, and of which the valor of the allied armies has victoriously defended against increasingly renewed offensives.

"Permit me to see in your decision the homage of all the nations that you represent toward a country which more than any other has endured the sufferings of war, of which entire Provinces have been transformed into a vast battle field, and have been systematically laid waste by the invader, and which has paid the human tribute in death.

GERMANY'S GUILT PROVED.

"France has borne these enormous sacrifices although she had not the slightest responsibility for the frightful catastrophe which has overwhelmed the universe. And at the moment when the cycle of horror is ending, all the powers whose delegates are assembled here may acquit themselves of any share in the crime which has resulted in so unprecedented a disaster. What gives you the authority to establish a peace of justice is the fact that none of the peoples of whom you are the delegates has had any part in the injustice. Humanity can place confidence in you because you are not among those who have outraged the rights of humanity.

"There is no need of further information or for special inquiries into the origin of the drama which has just shaken the world. The truth, bathed in blood, has already escaped from the imperial archives. The premeditated character of the trap is to-day clearly proved.

"In the hope of conquering first the hegemony of Europe and next the mastery of the world, the central empires, bound together by a secret plot, found the most abominable of pretexts for trying to crush Serbia and force their way to the East. At the same time they disowned the most solemn undertakings in order to crush Belgium and force their way into the heart of France.

CALLS OUTRAGES UNFORGETTABLE.

"These are the two unforgettable outrages which opened the way to aggression. The combined efforts of Great Britain, France, and Russia were exerted against that man-made arrogance.

"If after long vicissitudes those who wished to reign by the sword have perished by the sword, they have only themselves to blame. They have been destroyed by their own blindness.

"What could be more significant than the shameful bargains they attempted to offer to Great Britain and France at the end of July, 1914, when to Great Britain they suggested: 'Allow us to attack France on land and we will not enter the channel,' and when they instructed their ambassador to say to France: 'We will only accept a declaration of neutrality on your part if you surrender to us Briey, Toul, and Verdun.' It is in the light of these things, gentlemen, that all the conclusions you will have to draw from the war will take shape.

"Your nations entered the war successively, but came one and all to the help of threatened right. Like Germany, Great Britain had guaranteed the independence of Belgium. Germany sought to crush Belgium. Great Britain and France both swore to save her.

"Thus, from the very beginning of hostilities there came into conflict the two ideas which for 50 months were to struggle for the dominion of the world—the idea of sovereign force which accepts neither control nor check, and the idea of justice, which depends on the sword only to prevent or repress the abuse of strength.

"Faithfully supported by her dominions and her colonies, Great Britain decided that she could not remain aloof from a struggle in which the fate of every country was involved. She has made, and her dominions and colonies have made with her, prodigious efforts to prevent the war from ending in the triumph of the spirit of conquest and the destruction of right.

"Japan, in her turn, only decided to take up arms out of loyalty to Great Britain, her great ally, and from the consciousness of the danger in which both Asia and Europe would have stood of the hegemony of which the Germanic Empires dreamed.

ITALY AIDING THE OPPRESSED.

"Italy, who from the first had refused to lend a helping hand to German ambition, arose against an age-long foe only to answer the call of oppressed populations and to destroy at the cost of her blood the artificial political combination which took no account of human liberty.

"Roumania resolved to fight only to realize that national unity which was opposed by the same powers of arbitrary force. Abandoned, betrayed, and strangled, she had to submit to an abominable treaty, the revision of which you will exact.

"Greece, whom the enemy for many months tried to turn from her traditions and destinies, raised an army only to escape attempts at domination of which she felt the growing threat.

"Portugal, China, and Siam abandoned neutrality only to escape the strangling pressure of the central powers.

"Thus it was the extent of German ambitions that brought so many peoples, great and small, to align themselves against the same adversary. And what shall I say of the solemn resolutions taken by the United States in the spring of 1917, under the auspices of its illustrious President, Mr. Wilson, whom I am happy to greet here in the name of grateful France, and if you will allow me to say so, gentlemen, in the name of all the nations represented in this room.

JUDGMENT PASSED BY AMERICA.

"What shall I say of the many other American powers which either declared themselves against Germany—Brazil, Cuba, Panama, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Haiti, Honduras—or at least broke off diplomatic relations—Bolivia, Peru, Ecuador, Uruguay. From the north to the south the New World arose with indignation when it saw the Empires of central Europe, after having let loose the war without provocation and without excuse, carry it on with fire, pillage, and the massacre of inoffensive beings.

"The intervention of the United States was something more, something greater than a great political and military event. It was a supreme judgment passed at the bar of history by the lofty conscience of a free people and their Chief Magistrate on the enormous responsibilities incurred in the frightful conflict which was lacerating humanity.

"It was not only to protect itself from the audacious aims of German megalomania that the United States equipped fleets and created immense armies, but also and above all to defend an ideal of liberty over which it saw the huge shadow of the imperial eagle encroaching further every day. America, the daughter of Europe, crossed the ocean to rescue her mother from the humiliation of thraldom and to save civilization.

HUN DEBASED EVEN RELIGION.

"The American people wished to put an end to the greatest scandal that has ever sullied the annals of mankind. Autocratic governments, having prepared in the secrecy of the chancelleries and the general staffs a mad program of universal dominion, let loose their packs at the time fixed by their genius for intrigue and sounded the horns for the chase, ordering science (at the very time it was beginning to abolish distances, to bring men closer together, and make life sweeter) to leave the bright sky toward which it was soaring and to place itself submissively at the service of violence; debasing the religious idea to the extent of making God the complacent auxiliary of their passions and the accomplice of their crimes—in short, counting as naught the traditions and wills of peoples, the lives of citizens, the honor of women, and all those principles of public and private morality which we for our part have endeavored to keep unaltered throughout the war and which neither nations nor individuals can repudiate or disregard with impunity.

"While the conflict was gradually extending over the entire surface of the earth, the clanking of chains was heard here and there and captive nationalities from the depths of their age-long jails cried out to us for help. Yes, more, they escaped to come to our aid.

OLD RACES REBORN.

"Poland came to life again and sent us troops. The Czecho-Slovaks won their right to independence in Siberia, in France, and in Italy. The Jugoslavs, the Armenians, the Syrians and Levantines, the Arabs, all the victims, long helpless or resigned, of the historic deeds of injustice; all the martyrs of the past, all the outraged in conscience, all the strangled in liberty, viewed the clash of arms and turned to us as their natural defenders.

"The war gradually attained the fullness of its first significance and became in the full sense of the term a crusade of humanity for right, and if anything can console us, in part at least, for the losses we have suffered, it is assuredly the thought that our victory also is the victory of right. This victory is complete, for the enemy only asked for the armistice to escape from an irretrievable military disaster.

"In the interest of justice and peace it now rests with you to reap from this victory its full fruits. In order to carry out this immense task you have decided to admit at first only the allied or associated powers, and, in so far as their interests are involved in the debates, the nations which remained neutral.

MUST PRESERVE SOLIDARITY.

"You have thought that the terms of peace ought to be settled among ourselves before they are communicated to those against whom we have fought the good fight. The solidarity which has united us during the war and has enabled us to win military success ought to remain unimpaired during the negotiations for and after the signing of the treaty.

"It is not only the Governments but free peoples who are represented here. To the test of danger they have learned to know and help one another. They want their intimacy of yesterday to assure the peace of to-morrow. Vainly would our enemies seek to divide us. If they have not yet renounced their customary maneuvers, they will soon find that they are meeting to-day, as during hostilities, a homogeneous block, which nothing will be able to disintegrate. Even before the armistice you reached that necessary unity under the aid of the lofty moral and political truths of which President Wilson has nobly made himself the interpreter, and in the light of these truths you intend to accomplish your mission.

JUSTICE ALONE SOUGHT.

"You will, therefore, seek nothing but justice—justice that has no favorites, justice in territorial problems, justice in financial problems, justice in economic problems. But justice is not inert, it does not submit to injustice. What it demands, first, when it has been violated, are restitution and reparation for the peoples and individuals who have been despoiled or maltreated. In formulating this lawful claim it obeys neither hatred nor an instinctive or thoughtless desire for reprisals. It pursues a twofold object—to render to each his due, and not to encourage crime through leaving it unpunished.

"What justice also demands, inspired by the same feeling, is the punishment of the guilty and effective guaranties against an active return of the spirit by which they are prompted, and it is logical to demand that these guaranties should be given, above all, to the nations that have been and might again be most exposed to aggression or threat, to those who have many times stood in danger of being submerged by the periodic tide of the same invasion.

DREAMS OF CONQUEST ENDED.

"What justice banishes is the dream of conquest and imperialism, contempt for national will, the arbitrary exchange of Provinces between States, as though peoples were but articles of furniture or pawns in a game. The time is no more when diplomatists could meet to redraw with authority the map of the empires on the corner of a table. If you are to remake the map of the world, it is in the name of the peoples, and one condition is that you shall faithfully interpret their thoughts and respect the right of nations, small and great, to dispose of themselves, and to reconcile with this the equally sacred right of ethnical and religious minorities—a formidable task which science and history, your two advisers, will contribute to assist and facilitate.

"You will naturally strive to secure the material and moral means of subsistence for all those peoples who are constituted or reconstituted into States; for those who wish to unite themselves to their neighbors; for those who divide themselves into separate units; for those who reorganize themselves; for those who divide themselves according to their regained traditions; and, lastly, for all those who see freedom you have already sanctioned or are about to sanction. You will not call them into existence only to sentence them to death immediately because you would like your work in this, as in all other matters, to be fruitful and lasting.

WILL FORM NATIONS' LEAGUE.

"While introducing into the world as much harmony as possible you will, in conformity with the fourteenth of the propositions unanimously adopted by the great allied powers, establish a general league of nations which will be the supreme guaranty against any fresh assault upon the right of peoples. You do not intend this international association to be directed against anybody in the future. It will not, of a set purpose, shut out anybody, but, having been organized by the nations that have sacrificed themselves in the defense of right, it will receive from them its statutes and fundamental rules.

"It will lay down conditions concerning present or future adherence and, as it is to have for its essential aim the prevention as far as possible of the renewals of wars, it will, above all, seek to gain respect for the peace which you will have established and will find it the less difficult to maintain in proportion, as this peace will in itself imply the greater realities of justice and safer guaranties of stability.

ANNIVERSARY OF HUN EMPIRE.

"By establishing this new order of things you will meet the aspirations of humanity, which, after the frightful convulsions of the blood-stained years, ardently wishes to feel itself protected by a union of free people against the ever-possible revival of primitive savagery. An immortal glory will attach to the names of the nations and the men who have desired to cooperate in this grand work in faith and brotherhood and who have taken the pains to eliminate from the future peace causes of disturbance and instability.

"This very day, 48 years ago, on the 18th of January, 1871, the German Empire was proclaimed by an army of invasion in the chateau at Versailles. It was consecrated by the theft of two French Provinces. It was thus a violation from its origin, and, by the fault of its founders, it was born in injustice. It has ended in oblivion.

"You are assembled in order to repair the evil that has been done and to prevent a recurrence of it. You hold in your hands the future of the world. I leave you, gentlemen, to your grave deliberations and declare the conference of Paris open."

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

President Poincare and Premier Clemenceau, in their speeches at the opening of the peace congress yesterday, both referred to President Wilson's proposed league of nations, as follows:

PRESIDENT POINCARE.

"While introducing into the world as much harmony as possible you will, in conformity with the fourteenth of the propositions unanimously adopted by the great allied powers, establish a general league of nations which will be the supreme guaranty against any fresh assault upon the rights of peoples. You do not intend this international association to be directed against anybody in the future. It will not, of a set purpose, shut out anybody, but having been organized by the nations that have sacrificed themselves in the defense of right, it will receive from them its statutes and fundamental rules."

PREMIER CLEMENCEAU.

"All else must be subordinated to the necessity of a closer and closer union among the nations who have taken part in this great war and to the necessity of remaining friends. For the league of nations is here. It is yourself. It is for you to make it live, and to make it live we must have it really in our hearts.

"As I told President Wilson a few days ago there is no sacrifice that I am not willing to make in order to accomplish this, and I do not doubt that you all have the same sentiment. We will make these sacrifices, but on the condition that we endeavor impartially to conciliate interests apparently contradictory, on the higher plane of a greater, happier, and better humanity."

WILSON PRAISES CLEMENCEAU, MOVING ELECTION; PREMIER, ACCEPTING, PLEADS FOR A CLOSER UNION.

PARIS, January 18.

In his speech at the opening of the peace conference to-day, proposing Premier Clemenceau for the permanent chairmanship, President Wilson said:

"Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to propose as permanent chairman of the conference Mr. Clemenceau, the president of the council.

"I would do this as a matter of custom. I would do this as a tribute to the French Republic. But I wish to do it as something more than that. I wish to do it as a tribute to the man.

"France deserves the precedence not only because we are meeting at her capital, and because she has undergone some of the most tragical suffering of the war, but also because her capital, her ancient and beautiful capital, has so often been the center of conferences of this sort, on which the fortunes of large parts of the world turned.

"It is a very delightful thought that the history of the world, which has so often centered here, will now be crowned by the achievements of this conference—because there is a sense in which this is the supreme conference of the history of mankind.

"More nations are represented here than were ever represented in such a conference before. The fortunes of all peoples are involved. A great war is ended, which seemed about to bring a universal cataclysm. The danger is passed. A victory has been won for mankind, and it is delightful that we should be able to record these great results in this place.

"But it is more delightful to honor France, because we can honor her in the person of so distinguished a servant. We have all felt in our participation in the struggles of this war the fine steadfastness which characterized the leadership of the French in the hands of Mr. Clemenceau. We have learned to admire him, and those of us who have been associated with him have acquired a genuine affection for him.

"Moreover, those of us who have been in these recent days in constant consultation with him know how warmly his purpose is set toward the goal of achievement to which all our faces are turned. He feels as we feel, as I have no doubt everybody in this room feels, that we are trusted to do a great thing, to do it in the highest spirit of friendship and accommodation, and to do it as promptly as possible in order that the hearts of men may have fear lifted from them, and that they may return to those purposes of life which will bring them happiness and contentment and prosperity.

"Knowing his brotherhood of heart in these great matters, it affords me a personal pleasure to propose that Mr. Clemenceau shall be the permanent chairman of this conference."

SUCCESS IMPOSSIBLE UNLESS ALL STAY UNITED, CLEMENCEAU WARNS.

PARIS, January 18.

Premier Clemenceau at to-day's peace conference spoke as follows:

"You would not expect me to keep silence after what the two eminent statesmen, who have just spoken, have said. I can not help expressing my great, my profound gratitude to the illustrious President of the United States, to the prime minister of Great Britain, and to Baron Sonnino for the words I have just heard from their lips.

"Long ago, when I was young, as Mr. Lloyd George has recalled to you, when I was traveling in America and in England I always heard the French reproached for an excess of courtesy, which sometimes went beyond the truth. As I listened to the American statesman and to the English statesman I wondered whether they had not caught in Paris our national disease of courtesy. Nevertheless, gentlemen, I must say that my election is necessarily due to the old international tradition of courtesy to the country which has the honor to receive the peace conference in its capital.

TOUCHED BY FRIENDSHIP.

"I wish also to say that this testimony of friendship, if they will allow me the word, on the part of President Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George in particular, has touched me deeply, because I see in it a new strength for all three of us to accomplish with the cooperation of the entire conference the arduous work which is intrusted to us. I gather from it a new confidence in the success of our efforts.

"President Wilson has special authority to say that this is the first time in fact that the world has ever seen assembled together a delegation of all the civilized nations of the earth.

"The greater the bloody catastrophe which has devastated and ruined one of the richest parts of France, the greater and more splendid must be the reparation—not only the material reparation, the vulgar reparation, if I dare speak so, which is due all of us, but the higher and nobler reparation of the new institution which we will try to establish in order that nations may at length escape from the fatal embrace of ruinous wars which destroy everything, heap up ruins, terrorize the populace, and prevent them from going freely about their work for fear of enemies which may rise up from one day to the next.

MUST HAVE CLEAR IDEAS.

"It is a great, splendid, and noble ambition which has come to all of us. It is desirable that success should crown our efforts. This can not take place unless we all have firmly fixed and clearly determined ideas on what we wish to do.

"I said in the chamber a few days ago, and I wish to repeat here, that success is not possible unless we remain firmly united. We have come together as friends; we must leave this hall as friends.

"That, gentlemen, is the first thought that comes to me. All else must be subordinated to the necessity of a closer and closer union among the nations who have taken part in this great war and to the necessity of remaining friends. For the league of nations is here. It is yourself. It is for you to make it live, and to make it live we must have it really in our hearts.

WILLING TO SACRIFICE.

"As I told President Wilson a few days ago, there is no sacrifice that I am not willing to make in order to accomplish this, and I do not doubt that you all have the same sentiment. We will make these sacrifices, but on the condition that we endeavor impartially to conciliate interests apparently contradictory on the higher plane of a greater, happier, and better humanity.

"That, gentlemen, is what I had to say to you. I am touched beyond words at the evidence of good will and friendship which you show me.

"The program of this conference has been laid down by President Wilson. It is no longer the peace of a more or less vast territory, no longer the peace of continents; it is the peace of nations that is to be made. This program is sufficient in itself. There is no superfluous word. Let us try to act swiftly and well."

LLOYD GEORGE CALLS CLEMENCEAU "GRAND YOUNG MAN OF EUROPE."

PARIS January 18.

Following is the address of the British prime minister, Mr. Lloyd George, at the opening session of the peace conference:

"I count it not merely a pleasure but a great privilege that I should be expected, on behalf of the British Empire delegates, to support the motion of President Wilson. I do so for this reason which he has so eloquently given expression to, as a tribute to the man. When I was a schoolboy Mr. Clemenceau was a compelling and a conspicuous figure in the politics of his native land and his fame had extended far beyond the bounds of France.

IS "GRAND YOUNG MAN."

"Were it not for that undoubted fact, Mr. President, I should have treated as a legend the common report of your years. I have attended many conferences with Mr. Clemenceau, and in them all the most vigorous, the most enduring, and the most youthful figure there has been that of Mr. Clemenceau. He has had the youthfulness; he has had the hopefulness and the fearlessness of youth. He is, ideed, the 'grand young man' of France, and I am proud to stand here to propose that he should take the chair in this great conference that is to settle the peace of the world.

"I know of none better qualified, or as well qualified, to occupy this chair than Mr. Clemenceau. And I speak from my experience in its claim. He and I have not always agreed. We have very often agreed. We have sometimes disagreed, and we have always expressed our disagreements very emphatically, because we are ourselves.

NO WASTE OF TIME.

"But although there will be delays, and inevitable delays, in the signing of peace, due to the inherent difficulties of what we have to settle, I will guarantee, from my knowledge of Mr. Clemenceau, that there will be no waste of time. And that is important.

"The world is thirsting and hungering for peace. There are millions of people who want to get back to the world work of peace. And the fact that Mr. Clemenceau is in the chair will be proof that they will get there without any delays, except the difficulties which are essential in what we have to perform. He is one of the great speakers of the world. But no one knows better than he that the best speaking is that which impels beneficent actions.

EMBODIES FRENCH HEROISM.

"I have another reason. During the dark days we have passed through his courage, his unfailing courtesy, his untiring energy, his inspiration have helped the allies through to triumph, and I know of no one to whom that victory is more attributable than the man who sits in this chair. In his own person, more than any living man, he represents the heroism, he represents the genius of the indomitable people of his land.

"And for these reasons I count it a privilege that I should be expected to second this motion."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 14078. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SUPPLIES OF POTASH.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a short article from the Journal of Commerce of New York, published January 17, entitled "To permit no Alsace potash exportation." I wish to say in reference to this matter that some time ago it was stated in the public press in the shape of a cablegram from Paris that Mr. Hurley had announced that he had made arrangements under which potash was to be shipped from Alsace-Lorraine to the United States at an early date. This statement, which I felt at the time to be entirely erroneous, has done a great deal of damage, because it has put a stop to the purchase of potash made in the United States, which should have been purchased by the fertilizer companies and should go into the fertilizers to be used this season.

This article from the Journal of Commerce is short, and I am going to take the liberty of reading it:

[From the Journal of Commerce, Jan. 17, 1919.]

TO PERMIT NO ALSACE POTASH EXPORTATION—OUTPUT TO BE USED TO RESTORE FERTILITY OF FRENCH SOIL.

Absolutely no export shipments of potash will be permitted to leave the Alsatian potash fields for the next two or three years at least, according to authoritative information reaching Government officials here to-night from sources close to the French Government. French farms and fields are in such serious need for fertilizer, it was said, that the entire output of the potash fields now under French control will be used to restore the fertility of French soil.

Together with the protection from this source that will be afforded the newly started potash industry in this country, Government officials to-night declared that Prof. Taussig, of the Tariff Commission, now is engaged in drafting a bill to be presented to Congress giving such newly-started industries high-tariff protection until they have developed to meet foreign competition in American and foreign markets. This bill, it is understood, will include potash, manganese, nitrate, and similar products which the country heretofore has been importing to meet domestic requirements.

I wish to say that I do not indorse the idea that Congress should pass high-protective tariff legislation for the benefit of the potash industry. That is a question that has got to be considered on its merits subsequently. But I did protest at the time, and I renew my protest now, that after Government agencies have fostered the development of potash industries during the war and have, as a result of their activities, induced potash manufacturers to enlarge their plants until at the present time there are on storage in the United States nearly 100,000 tons of potash, it would be bad faith upon the part of the Government, either through Mr. Hurley or anybody else, to hasten the importation of potash from Alsace-Lorraine at this time in order to destroy the market for the American product that has been built up under Government patronage.

I ask to have this article go in the RECORD for the purpose of verifying the statement I made on the floor of the Senate the other day that no potash from Alsace-Lorraine and no potash from Germany can be brought into this country in time to be used in the fertilizers for the present season.

I am going to ask to have inserted in the RECORD also, without reading, a letter from the National Fertilizer Association, in which the president admits that foreign potash can not be brought into this country at this time.

THE NATIONAL FERTILIZER ASSOCIATION,
Baltimore, January 10, 1919.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I note in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 935, a copy of a telegram to you from the Nebraska Potash Producers Association and a report of your statement to the Senate, from which I find that you are under the impression that the fertilizer companies are refusing to buy potash in the hope of being able to import potash from Europe to put into fertilizers for the coming spring season.

In the December 19 issue of the Manufacturers Record there was published a letter addressed by the editor of the publication to Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior Department, in which the editor made a very venomous attack on the fertilizer industry, the contents of which are without foundation and apparently without a proper understanding of the situation.

The fertilizer manufacturers have been cooperating with the Nebraska producers and other potash producers throughout the country and are making every possible effort to dispose of the increased production of potash in this country. We have felt absolutely certain that there was no possibility of bringing any potash from Europe in time for its use in fertilizers for the coming spring and were very much surprised recently at a statement made by Chairman Hurley, of the Shipping Board, through the Associated Press, that he expected to bring to America immediately a very large tonnage of potash from France. We still believe, however, that the position taken by the War Trade Board that no potash would be imported in time for this spring will be carried through, and the fertilizer manufacturers have made their purchases accordingly; but the publicity given Mr. Hurley's statement has resulted in the farmers holding up their orders to such an extent that very little fertilizer is moving. They believe that this potash will come on the market at a very low price and reduce their cost of fertilizer. Unless they are given to understand definitely that there will be no potash from Europe, I am doubtful whether the usual tonnage of fertilizer can be shipped in time for this spring's crops.

I have addressed a reply to the editor of the Manufacturers Record, copy of which I have sent to Secretary Lane, and I am taking the liberty of attaching a copy of it to this letter with the hope that you will have time to read it.

In this letter I have endeavored to set forth the position of the fertilizer manufacturers as clearly as possible.

We are urging increased use of potash in our propaganda and advertising, but if the farmers will not buy it, the manufacturers can not be expected to buy it from the producers.

I feel very confident that if you will take this matter up with the Nebraska producers, they will prove to you that they are satisfied with the cooperation they are receiving from the fertilizer manufacturers throughout the country.

Yours, very truly,

W. D. HUNTINGTON, President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator from Nebraska that I have received several telegrams from persons relating to this matter apprehending that Mr. Hurley would endeavor to get the Alsace-Lorraine potash here. They are very much exercised over it, and it does seem to me it would be an injustice to permit that to be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that I have investigated the matter, and I have even used the cables for the purpose; and I feel absolutely warranted in saying that no potash can come into this country; that France is now levying upon all the potash in Alsace-Lorraine, and is selling it to agricultural interests and to the fertilizer interests of France in carload lots at rates that the Government has fixed, which are rather high rates for the present; that France will consume all that potash; and that the effort of the fertilizer companies to abstain from the purchase of American potash will prove a vain one; that they will be compelled to buy the American potash if they satisfy the agricultural needs.

I am aware that a meeting is to be held in New York next week for the purpose of attempting to arrange for securing potash from Alsace-Lorraine, and I simply want in this public way to renew the statement I made some two or three weeks ago on the floor of the Senate that it will be impossible to secure Alsace-Lorraine potash this year, and that all attempts and representations held out to the agricultural interests that it will come in here are delusive and will simply result in disappointment and perhaps in imposition.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, right in this connection I think it well to have a telegram read on this very subject as a part of my remarks. The telegram is addressed to the chairman of the Public Lands Committee, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. It is a copy of the telegram.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

JANUARY 17, 1919.

War Trade Board declare trade open between Alsace and America, and Hurley proposes bring half a million tons of Alsatian potash in ballast in Government ships. Alsatian mines not damaged; can commence production immediately. American potash can not compete with low-priced potash at present. Reported that Interior Department recommends bill providing $10,000,000 national corporation to purchase domestic potash at fair profit to producers as a temporary measure for a period sufficient to allow producers to amortize plants and enable completion later without assistance. Consumers should be obliged to purchase all domestic potash at Government price before buying foreign potash. Please urge passage of this bill or some action by the Government to protect American producers. Over $10,000,000 has been invested in Pacific coast potash plants alone practically at the Government's request. Expect to reach Washington about February 5.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have been led to believe from a study of the potash question that this country requires about 500,000 tons of potash annually. This country in the past has produced only about 20,000 tons of potash annually. I am surprised at two statements of the Senator from Nebraska, one that 100,000 tons of potash are in storage, not being used, considering the demand, and the other that we are capable in any way of supplying the demands for this country of 500,000 tons. I do not understand when there is a demand for 500,000 tons how there can be 100,000 tons in storage.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly this country, like the countries of Europe, during the war has been subjected to a sort of potash starvation, but the fact is absolutely as I have stated it to the Senate. Nearly 100,000 tons of potash have been produced and are now stored, and the fertilizer companies of the United States under what has seemed to be an agreement among themselves have refused even to bid upon it or to offer anything for it. It is very evident that Mr. Hurley's activities in France and his telegram to this country are more in the interest of the fertilizer companies than they are in behalf of the agricultural interests. I have not any doubt that Mr. Hurley has exerted himself to secure this potash, and the telegram which was sent over to this country was intended to fortify the fertilizer companies in their refusal to buy American potash, but I again aver that the American-made potash is the only potash which the fertilizer companies will be able to secure this year, and the simple reason is that France will require all the potash that Alsace-Lorraine can produce for this season.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, potash was selling at about from $35 to $40 a ton prior to the war. I should like to know if the Senator from Nebraska can tell us at what price this hundred thousand tons of potash is held?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My impression is that potash has been selling at over $200 a ton. I will say that this potash was produced by the most expensive labor during the war. The plants have been built by purchasing machinery at two, three, and even four times the ordinary cost; the pipes that have been used have been purchased at an enormous price. Under Government stimulation labor has been paid two or three times the ordinary price in order to produce this potash for agricultural purposes in the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am deeply interested in the production of potash, and I realize that the Government, through its bureaus, has stimulated the production of potash at an enormous expense; but justice must be done in those particulars. I do not think, however, that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is justified in intimating that Mr. Hurley has a deeper interest in the producers of fertilizers than he has in anything else in this matter. The additional price that fertilizer companies must pay for potash will be transferred to the consumer of potash. It is a very difficult thing for some farmers to pay from $200 to $300 a ton for potash in fertilizer form and use it at all.

Mr. KING. They can not afford to do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the farmers of this country who require potash can obtain it anywhere at from $30 to $40 a ton and 500,000 tons a year are needed and this country can only produce 100,000 tons a year, it is the duty of this Government to assist the farmers in obtaining that potash. I think it is wrong to surround this 100,000 tons of accumulated potash with a tariff wall, or an embargo wall, or anything else that requires the producers of the country to pay any price that the owners of that 100,000 tons of potash may demand. That is exactly what we are up against.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nevada has not understood me as either favoring a tariff or an embargo for that purpose. What I sought to say was that an attempt to represent to the American public that we were going to get potash from Alsace-Lorraine, when we are not going to get it, is not right. It has been absolutely demonstrated through governmental agencies that we are not to receive any potash from Alsace-Lorraine in time to be used for the present season, and I am making this public statement for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear on the fertilizer companies to act upon that information and not to attempt to delude the agricultural interests with the idea that they are going to get potash from Alsace-Lorraine, when they are not going to get it this season, and I know it. They are not going to get it because we put on an embargo or because we propose a tariff—for I propose neither—but they are not going to get it because France absolutely requires that potash. I am only speaking here in the interest of truth.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think there is any more serious thing facing the economic world to-day than the lack of potash for fertilizer. All who have given the question any study know that the crop production of this country has been materially affected by the lack of potash. The cotton crop in many places has been absolutely destroyed by the lack of potash. There is no other fertilizer that will take its place.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Nevada is entirely correct; and it was for that reason, while war was on and we could obtain no potash, that these governmental agencies of the country and the potash users urged the manufacturers of potash to invest their money. They did so invest their money; and in my State at the present time more than one-half the potash of the United States is produced by money which has been invested by 5,000 stockholders in Nebraska, who are likely to be ruined by this refusal of the fertilizer companies to purchase this great store of potash which has been accumulated. I feel that it is simply an attempt to delude the agricultural interests with the idea that we are going to get something from Europe which we are not going to get.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is no use of deluding the farmers of this country any more than there is a necessity of deluding the manufacturers of the country. The farmers of the country might as well know now definitely that they can not obtain the potash which they need from the home production of potash. The home production of potash in the United States to-day is not 10,000 tons a month, and the demand for potash for agricultural purposes alone before the war was 400,000 tons a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada gave a good deal of attention last year to the study of potash development in the West, and I am sure that at least one measure which he championed was with a view of opening up the development of potash. Has anything been accomplished in that line which the Senator could mention?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is a tremendous lake of potash in California. The deposit is so constituted that it may be worked very deeply. The testimony of experts is that it may be worked in competition with German potash. The bill to which the Senator from Georgia refers was passed by Congress long ago, but I regret to say that delays occurring elsewhere have prevented any material production of potash from that source. I am not discussing why potash has not been produced; but I tell you now that we are not producing 10,000 tons of potash per month in the United States, and that can not meet the demand for 400,000 tons per annum which exists.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not doubt that the American production of potash at this time is not so large as the demand will be in the future, and I have said that the American potash is all the potash that is available. I am rather disposed to challenge the figures that we are not producing 10,000 tons of potash a month. My information is that the accumulation of the year 1918 in potash production is now 100,000 tons in addition to what has already been sold.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have the statement of Mr. Hurley himself. I have not attempted to check it, but under that the production of potash is not in excess of 10,000 tons of oxide of potash per month. I have every reason to believe that that is the fact. I know of no great production of potash in the United States. There are a few little potash lakes in Nebraska which are producing some potash, and we are getting from alunite some potash in Utah and other places, but it is a small production to meet the demands. What I am getting at is that, instead of Mr. Hurley being criticized for an effort to get Alsatian potash over here, the necessity of the case not only ought to be presented to Mr. Hurley but should also be presented to the French Government. The French Government and other European countries are depending very largely on this country for food, and that food supply is going to be materially reduced unless we can get a large quantity of potash now, without any delay whatever.

I desire to refer to another branch of this question. I do not know how many potash concerns have been induced to go into the business through representations of the Government, but I am satisfied that the one which produced the 100,000 tons did not go in because of representations by the Government, but went into the business when potash went to $315 a ton. I venture to say—and I do not think anyone will contradict me—that that institution started without any capital to speak of and has made a million dollars since that time. There are possibly some institutions which have been induced to start because of governmental representations, and the Government is indebted to them morally, if not legally, to a certain extent, not only in connection with the production of potash but of manganese and many other articles. It is the intention, however, as I understand, to take care of those concerns through the Bureau of Mines bill—to take care of them by settling the contracts, as the effort is being made to settle all war contracts; but 90 per cent, in my opinion, of the potash producers of to-day are not entitled to a cent from the Government.

So far as maintaining a production and supply of potash throughout the West is concerned, I agree with the Senator about that. It would be wise if we could stimulate production in this country so that we would have an adequate supply of potash in case of war, in case we were cut off from potash as we were cut off from potash during the late war; but I do not think that the way to do it is to stop the introduction of potash into this country at a time when it is impossible for this country to supply it, no matter what laws we may pass. I do not think it is right, either, to take any steps that will allow the 100,000 tons of stored potash to be sold at an absolutely unreasonable profit.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

RETENTION OF UNIFORMS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the immediate consideration of a bill that is of a good deal of importance to the young men who are being discharged from the Army. I refer to the bill allowing them to retain their uniforms. I do not think it will lead to discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Can we not reach it on the calendar in regular order?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If we are going to take up the calendar, I withdraw the request.

The bill (S. 951) to provide for the sinking of artesian wells, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I think, is interested in that bill. He is out of the Chamber, and therefore I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

RECLAMATION OF ARID AND SWAMP LANDS.

The bill (S. 758) to increase the productive agricultural area of the United States by the reclamation of arid and swamp lands was announced as next in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nebraska insist upon his objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; but I should like to hear an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a bill that has been pending on the calendar for a long while and the passage of which has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. It is intended to aid in the reclamation not only of arid and semiarid lands but of swamp lands in the South as well. At a time when such an effort is being made to restore lands for settlement and cultivation by the young men who are returning from Europe, it seems to me very important that the bill should be considered and disposed of at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that the Interior Department contemplates reporting at an early date, in harmony with the wishes of many Senators and Congressmen, a bill to make provision for the reclamation of the arid lands of the West and the reclamation of swamp lands, and a large appropriation—perhaps $100,000,000—to provide homes for returning soldiers and sailors, would it not be better to consider this bill in connection with that or to consider that measure in connection with this? In other words, will they not parallel if not duplicate each other in a measure?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not think there is much danger of that. This bill has been on the calendar since November, 1917, if I mistake not. At least it has been on the calendar a great many months, and in the last analysis it does not take any money out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if this bill becomes a law, I do not think we will have any more money in our reclamation fund to go on with the reclamation projects of the West. This would be the last law on the subject, and if we undertake here to take $10,000,000 out of the reclamation fund we might just as well conclude now that there will be nothing from that fund to develop the projects that are under way in the West at the present time. I understand that comprehensive plans are under way, and will be reported to Congress in a very short time, for the reclamation of these swamp and arid lands; and I believe that a bill of this kind would simply be in conflict with those plans. The subject matter ought to be covered in a broad way. I am positive that that sort of legislation is under way in the Interior Department. I believe that it will meet the views of the Congress, and instead of having a piecemeal proposition it will be a complete system.

For that reason, Mr. President, I hope no action will be taken on this bill at this time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah objected to the consideration of this bill before there was any suggestion of a comprehensive plan for the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands and the reclamation of swamp lands; so I think possibly the Senator has at heart some other objection than the one he is insisting upon.

Of course, I see a disposition upon the part of some of the Senators to object to this, Mr. President; but there are millions of acres of land to which attention has been called by the Secretary of the Interior in the Southern States, particularly in Louisiana and portions of Mississippi and along the Gulf of Mexico, that can be reclaimed just as well as not. The Southern States have never had any benefit from the reclamation fund, and have never asked it. Here is a proposition that does not ask for the appropriation by the Government of any funds whatsoever. I am not going to insist on it if Senators want to turn it down by an objection. I have not been very urgent about it in the past, but it seems to me that it ought to be taken up and disposed of; and I am going to read just a few lines from Secretary Lane's report on this bill. It will be found attached to the calendar number in the bound books that the Senators have on their desks. He says:

> The purpose and the plan worked out in the bill has my hearty indorsement. The bill provides for extending the reclamation of irrigable lands in the arid and semiarid regions, and will also provide for the drainage and reclamation of water-logged lands in the said regions, as well as drainage in other parts of the country. Under the plan proposed in the bill these results will be accomplished in all probability without drawing upon the public funds.

That is what I am calling attention to. The Senator suggests that if this bill is passed there will be no more money appropriated for the reclamation of arid lands in the West. I say that it will aid in the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands in the West.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator if the statement which he has just made—namely, that if this bill passes it will draw upon the reclamation fund—would not result in taking funds which have been provided by Congress for the purpose of developing the arid lands of the West and placing them at the disposal of the Secretary of the Interior for disposition in the Southern States or upon private lands in other parts of the Union?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But this provides for a fund to reimburse the moneys which are temporarily taken from the reclamation fund. Let me call the attention of the Senator to a further extract from Secretary Lane's report:

> There is little likelihood of default in the payment of the principal and interest on the district bonds upon which the certificates of indebtedness are based. This seems so for the reason that the works will be constructed by the United States and paid for by the beneficiaries at cost, and they will doubtless be able to meet the comparatively light charges, on account of the long-time bonds to be issued by the districts, and for these same reasons the investing public will have confidence in the feasibility and success of the plan, so that I feel reasonably sure that the certificates of indebtedness will be freely purchased by the public.

So that while money is temporarily drawn from the reclamation fund it is not a permanent withdrawal, and in my opinion it will have a more beneficial effect toward reclaiming lands than even the reclamation act itself. But if there is a disposition to object to it, to await some future plans of the Secretary of the Interior—and he has at no time intimated that he intends to present a plan that is in conflict with this—I am not going to insist on it in view of that feeling.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am in very deep sympathy with the purposes sought to be effected by the enactment of this bill. I want to see something of the kind enacted at an early date; and if this measure did not embrace the proposition of diverting the reclamation fund, or part of it, from the purposes to which it was devoted by law, I would support it cheerfully, notwithstanding it calls for a large appropriation. But when the reclamation law was passed it was passed upon the express condition and understanding that the funds derived from the sale of public lands within these areas should be utilized for that purpose, and for that purpose only; and I do not think I overstate the situation when I say that but for that arrangement the reclamation act never could have commanded a majority in either House.

That fund is charged by law with a trust, and that trust was made a condition to the enactment of the bill. If, now, we legislate in such wise as to divert that fund even temporarily from the purposes to which it is devoted, I think it is to some extent bad faith exhibited and effected through subsequent legislation.

If the Senator will amend the bill so as to provide for obtaining the money necessary for this purpose from other sources, I will support it; but I do not feel at liberty, under the circumstances, to favor a measure which treats a fund charged with a trust in the manner that it is proposed to be treated here. Of course, in saying that, I am aware of the fact that the bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and that it is presented here by my friend, the Senator from Oregon, doubtless upon the assumption that this law, too, can be enacted only by utilizing the fund which it proposes to apply to the purposes of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I doubt whether anybody has sufficient ingenuity to discover why the United States Government ought, at the expense of the general taxpayers, to put water on land without admitting at the same time an equal right to take water off of land.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if that be true—and the Senator from Colorado says there is no doubt about it—then it seems to me that this fund for the purpose of the reclamation of land, whether by putting water on it or by taking water off of it, whichever might be needed, ought to be a common fund in the interest of the entire people of the United States. It ought not to be a selfish, sectional fund, in the interest of one section. As far as I am personally concerned, I have always somewhat doubted the right to do either, and I think the Supreme Court of the United States virtually decided that the Government did not have a right to do either; but Congress has been doing it. It has been doing it every year. If you are going to run the plow with the right hand, there is no reason why you should not run it with both hands. The plow will be steadier, I am sure, in the furrow.

In Louisiana especially, in Arkansas to a little less degree, and in Mississippi to a yet somewhat less degree there are immense areas of lands of the highest fertility, equal to the very valley of the Nile itself——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator? This bill is fairer in one respect than any other bill that we have had for the consideration of Congress, in that it provides for the organization of districts in overflowed and in semiarid regions, and the people themselves eventually pay the money.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and while that might be logically an objection to the bill, upon the ground that it does not put the man with too much water on the same footing with the man with too little water, it is still an argument practically in favor of the passage of the bill, because it costs the taxpayers less money in the long run. The real truth is that both of them ought to have been put upon the same footing at the very beginning. A man with too much water has just as much right to have it taken off at the general expense as the man with too little water has a right to have it put on at the general expense. I have always had my doubts whether the general expense ought to have borne either; but you have started out in that direction, and it has been going in that direction.

As the Senator from Oregon says, this bill goes a step or two beyond what justice and equity require, because it establishes a sort of revolving fund as to these lands that are going to be reclaimed by taking the water off of them, whereas all of us know that the so-called revolving fund for irrigated land is purely a matter of imagination.

Mr. THOMAS. It is the same fund.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; but that part of it which goes to reclamation by taking the water off will be paid back. That part of it which goes to reclamation by putting water on will never be paid back, as you and I both know.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think either of them will be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it will be because the bill undoubtedly fixes the machinery whereby it will be paid back.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am very reluctant to oppose the passage of this measure at this time, but I am heartily in sympathy with the view expressed by some other Senators that the subject should be considered as a whole. We know from the history of the reclamation of the arid lands of the West that that particular section of the country has enjoyed exclusively the bounty of the Federal Government. Up to the present time there has not been a disposition to grant assistance to reclaim the swamp and overflowed lands, but at present there seems to be a ray of hope that the Government will deal justly and equally with all the lands throughout the country which require reclamation and that the overflowed lands will be included as well as the arid lands of the West.

Far be it from me, Mr. President, to object to the reclamation of the arid lands of the West, but I feel in justice that we should have a general measure which will include the swamp and overflowed lands. Take my own State. We have there a vast territory of approximately 4,000,000 acres of rich and productive land.

Mr. PITTMAN. Has the Senator any plan by which the Government could develop State lands? I assume that, being swamp lands, they are nearly all State lands now.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of the swamp lands, possibly 40 per cent are State lands.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no plan by which the Government can develop State lands.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There is no plan now, but we might work out a plan. The swamp and overflowed lands of the State are, in a large measure, in a particular territory known as the Everglades of Florida. The State government owns about one and one-half million acres of the land in that territory and private individuals own two and one-half million acres. That is about the way in which the ownership is divided at the present time.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if the private ownership is not due to arrangements and contracts between the Government and the owners for the drainage and reclamation of the lands?

Mr. TRAMMELL. We have never had any arrangements of that kind up to the present time.

Mr. THOMAS. I had some clients in the Senator's State some years ago, who had purchased a very large tract of land from the State, and the contract provided that the consideration for the land should be used by the State authorities for the purpose of drainage.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That statement is correct with regard to some of the sales in the early inception of the reclamation project in Florida upon what is known as the Everglades territory. The land board having charge of State lands did agree that the proceeds from certain land sales should be used for the purpose of drainage and reclamation, and that has been done. We have there a vast territory of about 4,000,000 acres of land, which is in process of reclamation at the present time, and there is no more productive or valuable land in the United States when once reclaimed. The Everglades of Florida, the immense drainage district of which I am speaking, is not a swamp, as is commonly supposed throughout the country.

In my boyhood in studying geography I formed the impression that it was an impenetrable swamp, where you could scarcely make your way through the jungle; but later on, when the reclamation project was agitated and we became better informed in Florida, we found that, instead of its being a swamp, this 4,000,000 acres of land is a vast open territory resembling very largely a water-covered prairie, and instead of being swamp land, requiring enormous expense for clearing, we have there an open territory where if you once take the water off the land you can prepare it for cultivation for the small sum of from three to six or eight dollars per acre, depending more or less upon the location.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is the title to the land the Senator is now describing in the State or in the Federal Government?

Mr. TRAMMELL. About 1,500,000 acres of it belong to the State and about 2,500,000 acres belong to private individuals.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It belongs either to the State or to private individuals?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator indicate what warrant there is for the utilization of the taxes collected for Federal purposes for the reclamation of private lands and lands owned by the State of Florida?

Mr. TRAMMELL. You have the property as security, just as you have when the Federal Government contributes funds for the reclamation of arid lands.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. TRAMMELL. You have the land as security.

Mr. KING. The arid lands of the West that have been reclaimed belong to the Government of the United States, and the only way by which the land could be sold—and that was the theory upon which the legislation was warranted, as I understand it—was to develop those lands; that is to say, put water on them. The lands were absolutely valueless unless there was water for their irrigation, and the Government, in order to sell the land as well as to furnish homes for citizens who desired homes, made an appropriation in the shape of a revolving fund which has been utilized for the construction of reservoirs and irrigation systems in order to irrigate the land. It is clear that there is a distinction between lands owned by the Government itself and lands owned by States and by private individuals. Speaking for myself, I see no authority whatever on the part of the Federal Government to take money out of the Treasury to develop private lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon an interruption there?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unfortunately for his logic, the facts do not accord with his statement. The State of Texas, for example, has received its share of moneys to develop arid lands, and the State of Texas owned every acre; the Federal Government owned none of it.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error. The State of Texas has not received a single dollar, and my advices are that no State has received any money, but the money has been expended for the purpose of reclaiming the lands belonging to the Government of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am relying merely on my memory, but if in the House of Representatives some 15 years ago an amendment did not go on one of the irrigation bills to include Texas, then I am very much mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS. It went on there, but it never became a law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has had 5 minutes, and the debate has taken 10. The question is, Are you going to send the bill over?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object, if that will end the debate.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill goes over. This is Calendar Monday, and it was supposed to be for the purpose of disposing of the calendar, not engaging in general discussion.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "Street," to insert the words "for traffic," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, upon the opening of Buchanan Street for traffic between Piney Branch Road and Sixteenth Street NW., in the District of Columbia, to abandon as a public highway that part of Piney Branch Road lying between the north line of Allison Street and the south line of Buchanan Street, and the title to the land contained in said abandoned part of road shall revert to the owners of the land abutting thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on the District of Columbia report to strike out the preamble. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

PUBLIC AND NATIONAL FOREST LANDS IN ARIZONA.

The bill (S. 3914) authorizing a right of way for the transportation of water for improvement of grazing and development of the live-stock industry upon public and national forest lands in Arizona was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 5, after the word "firm," to strike out the word "person" and insert "citizen"; in the same line, after "association," to insert "of citizens"; and in the same line after the word "corporation," to insert "of the United States"; on page 2, line 10, after the word "Provided," to strike out "That said approval of the Secretary of the Interior shall be given within or through any national forest only upon such conditions and stipulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may require," and insert "That said approval of the Secretary of the Interior shall not be given within or through any national forest, except with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and under such conditions and stipulations as the latter may require for the fullest utilization and proper administration of the national forest, and such approval may be withheld whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, it would not be to the best interests of the national forests," so as to make the section read:

That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, as hereinafter provided, there are hereby granted to any firm, citizen, association of citizens, or corporation of the United States engaged in the live-stock industry in the State of Arizona, easements and rights of way in and over national forests, public lands, and reservations of the United States, surveyed or unsurveyed, in said State of Arizona for reservoirs, canals, pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, or other water conduits and waterworks and appurtenances, for the purpose of furnishing water to live stock and for other beneficial purposes connected with the live-stock industry. Upon the filing by the grantee of maps and other pertinent data showing the location and character of such easements and rights of way, and the approval thereof by the said Secretary, all lands, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, in or over which such easements and rights of way shall extend, shall be disposed of subject to such easements and rights of way: Provided, That said approval of the Secretary of the Interior shall not be given within or through any national forest except with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and under such conditions and stipulations as the latter may require for the fullest utilization and proper administration, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 24, after the word "after," to insert "a date to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior and not exceeding"; and on page 3, line 1, after the word "of," to strike out "this act" and insert "approval of the Secretary of the Interior," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the grant herein authorized shall be upon the express condition that from and after a date to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior and not exceeding 50 years from the date of approval of the Secretary of the Interior the United States shall have the right to take over the easements and rights of way herein granted and any other property of grantees dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon such easements and rights of way, and upon condition that it shall pay, before taking possession, the reasonable value of all property taken over, including structures and fixtures acquired, erected, or placed upon the lands and included in the water plant, such reasonable value to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That such reasonable value shall not include or be construed to mean or be affected by the value of the franchise, good will, or profits to be earned on pending contracts or any other intangible element.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, in section 3, the following words:

That if any grantee shall fail to construct such reservoirs and water conduits within five years from and after the date of this act, or thereafter shall fail to utilize and maintain the same for any continuous period of five years, the grant may be forfeited by appropriate proceedings in the United States district court for the district in which such property or some part thereof is attached.

And to insert:

That all or any part of such rights of way shall be forfeited and annulled by the Secretary of the Interior upon proper finding by the head of the department having jurisdiction over the land, of failure to complete construction within five years, or for nonuse for a period of two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ETHEL PROCTOR.

The bill (S. 3258) for the relief of Ethel Proctor was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I see that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is here. Before consenting to the consideration of the bill I should like to hear an explanation of it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The truth is that the committee, after reducing the bill more than one-half, concluded to vote to the widow of Mr. Proctor, who was one of the early sanitary engineers of the Panama Canal, the sum of $2,100. Mr. Proctor, according to the chief of the sanitary experts down there, from 1912 up to the time of his death was a very efficient man. In the streams and marshes, and so forth, he was really a martyr to that work, and his life was given to his country in that service.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I am opposed, as the Senator knows, to the granting of pensions except in meritorious cases. I have read the report accompanying the bill, and I think it is one of the most meritorious instances that has ever come before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am obliged to the Senator. I do not think I need say anything more about it. It is an exceptionally meritorious case.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt that the reduction of the amount asked, from $5,000 to $2,100, is in conformity with the rule of the Senate, and not only the rule of the Senate but the law that a year's salary shall be paid to one dying while in the employ of the Government in the Canal Zone. I suppose Mr. Proctor received $2,100 a year when he was working on the Canal Zone.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is correct.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on line 7, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,100," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Ethel Proctor, widow of Almon R. Proctor, the sum of $2,100 to compensate her for the death of her husband on June 26, 1912, due to malarial poisoning contracted while in the discharge of his duty as sanitary inspector on the Panama Canal in the employ of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 3260) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Wilbur F. Lawton was next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 4459) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That may go over temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Senate resolution 249, to print the article entitled "The Electoral College and Presidential Suffrage" as a Senate document, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 2923) for the relief of the Philippine Scouts was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 4221) for the relief of private owners of lands within or near the Bitterroot National Forest, Mont., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

WAR COLLEGE LIBRARY.

The bill (S. 4366) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1913 (38 Stats. L., p. 475), was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice that there is no report filed with this bill. If there is no one very deeply interested in it, I should like to have it go over until I can get the report.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will find a report with the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that on my calendar there is no report filed with the bill. I ask the Secretary if there is a report accompanying the bill?

The SECRETARY. Report No. 481.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, before we pass from the consideration of Senate bill 4366, I desire to say it seems that the War College is one of the depository libraries, and that it is getting a vast amount of documents with no place to put them. This legislation is simply to relieve them of that burden and allow them to transfer the documents. The War Department states:

It would seem that the librarian should be authorized by act of Congress to return such public documents to the superintendent of documents as do not fall within the scope of the collection of the library.

This measure is to enable these libraries to get rid of a lot of stuff which they can not use.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering whether or not "the stuff" which it is proposed to authorize them to return is worth the postage which will be required to carry it from where it is to-day back to Washington.

Mr. FLETCHER. This applies to the War College right here in Washington, as I take it.

Mr. SMOOT. It is at the War College?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it is at the War College.

Mr. SMOOT. The only addition there is in reference to the librarian.

Mr. FLETCHER. Well, it will not hurt for the bill to go over, anyway, and I will get a copy of the report.

JOHN H. ARMSTRONG.

The bill (S. 3269) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John H. Armstrong was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

ADDITIONAL PROBATION OFFICER FOR THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 10891) to amend and reenact an act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. I hope the Senator from Utah will withdraw his objection for a moment.

Mr. KING. I will withhold the objection for a moment.

Mr. POMERENE. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. SMITH of Maryland] has sent word to me that he is very anxious to have this bill passed. I may say, in explanation of it, that the only respect in which it proposes to change the present law is that in the police court of the District the probation work has become so extensive that they need an additional assistant probation officer and also a stenographer and typewriter. This bill provides for two assistant probation officers instead of one, as heretofore, at a salary of $1,200, and for a stenographer at a salary of $1,200. I think from what I have learned that the legislation is very much needed.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio what number of employees now has the probation department of the police court?

Mr. POMERENE. I am not able to answer that; but allow me to say, as shedding some light upon the matter, that I am advised that there are a number of public-spirited women in the District of Columbia who are now voluntarily acting without compensation as probation officers. The work, however, has become so extended that they are not able to attend to it, and they are asking for this legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I should like to know the personnel of this bureau or agency of the municipality. There is a disposition to increase the number of officers in all departments and bureaus and agencies of the Government, and it will always be found that those who are filling these positions find some excuse or pretext for an augmentation of salaries and an increase in the number to be added to the department or agency of the municipality.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize the tendency in that direction, but I think we all agree that here in the city of Washington there has been a very large increase in population during the last year or two. I think that reason, if no other, would to some extent explain the need for additional officers.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason for the additional help proposed to be provided by this bill is that there is a great increase in the population of the District at the present time?

Mr. POMERENE. I think that that is the reason for it; yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought, of course, that that was the reason for it. It seems to me when normal conditions return here we ought to go back to the number of officers we have to-day. There is nothing, however, in this bill proposing to limit the appointment of these officials.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is force in the Senator's suggestion, but allow me to say that if it develops later on that this additional assistant is not needed we can change the law, and I shall certainly be very glad to have it changed if later it is found that it is not necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but to get a person off the statutory roll is something that very seldom ever happens in the history of the United States. I am afraid if they go on the roll they will remain there forever and ever hereafter.

Mr. KING. I shall ask leave to amend the bill by making it expire by limitation in one year. I will not consent to the consideration of the bill unless it shall be agreed that that amendment shall be made to it.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not sufficient information at hand to even suggest to the Senator from Utah that this legislation should be continued, but if what he suggests is an objection I shall accept the amendment for the present with that understanding. I think I ought to say that I understand that the House committee went into this subject very fully, and if the amendment does not meet their approval the matter can be worked out in conference.

Mr. KING. But with the information furnished us I should not feel like making this a permanent addition to the personnel of that agency. I shall, therefore, ask that the bill be amended limiting its operation to one year.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Utah suggest where such an amendment should be inserted?

Mr. KING. I have not a copy of the bill before me.

Mr. FLETCHER. It appears, Mr. President, from the report on the bill that at present the paid official personnel consists of one probation officer and one assistant probation officer. So it seems as if they need this assistant permanently. I do not very well see how they can perform all the duties which devolve upon them. I shall not object to the amendment, however, but I am inclined to think that this provision should be made permanent.

Mr. KING. The bill is so intertwined with the existing statute that it is very difficult to amend it. I suggest to the Senator that he allow the bill to be passed over to give me an opportunity to examine it and prepare the necessary amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. And we can take it up a little later?

Mr. KING. Yes. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. POMERENE. I can give the Senator a little information which I find in the report as to the amount of business transacted. The judges of the police court of the District of Columbia, under date of March 21, 1918, sent a letter to the chairman of the District Committee of the House, in which they say, among other things:

> Last year the police court collected in fines the sum of $165,554.83. There were 35,645 persons arrested and charged with offenses in court; 18,461 paid fines and 7,559 were committed to jail in default of the payment of fines. There were 9,612 cases of public intoxication, 6,276 being white persons and 3,336 colored.
> The court released on probation 1,927 persons.

That is quite a little army for one probation officer and his assistant to look after. I am willing, however, that the bill shall be passed over temporarily.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest that in line 9, page 2, if the Senator from Utah desires to insist upon the amendment of the bill, that it be amended by inserting, after the words "per annum," the words "for one year," so that it would read: "and one stenographer and typist at a salary of $1,200 per annum for one year"?

Mr. KING. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Florida as the amendment to be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the words "per annum," it is proposed to insert the words "for one year," so as to read:

> One stenographer and typist at a salary of $1,200 per annum for one year.

Mr. POMERENE. Then another amendment should be made before that with reference to the two assistant probation officers at a salary of $1,200 each. Did the Senator from Florida suggest an amendment there?

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not notice that.

Mr. KING. I think perhaps it will be better to adhere to my suggestion and pass the bill over for the present.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; and I will call it up later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 3379) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange public coal lands for private coal lands in certain cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

HIGHWAY TO NATIONAL MONUMENTS.

The bill (S. 4439) to provide for the survey of a national highway connecting certain national monuments in the States of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of Agriculture to survey and examine a feasible route or routes for a national highway which shall connect the Mukuntweap National Monument, the Grand Canyon National Monument, the Mesa Verde National Park, the Rainbow Bridge National Monument, and the Natural Bridges National Monument, in the States of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico, and provides that upon completion of the survey the Secretary of Agriculture shall make a report on the subject to the Congress. And to carry out the provisions of the bill there is appropriated the sum of $20,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN OREGON.

The bill (S. 2494) to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national forest land was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the State of Oregon to select, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, a compact body of not to exceed 40,000 acres of unappropriated nonmineral land within townships 10 and 11 south, ranges 5 and 6 east, Willamette meridian, in the Santiam National Forest, Oreg., to be maintained as a State forest, to secure its highest permanent usefulness to the State of Oregon, and particularly to the common schools to which its resources are devoted, and to State forestry demonstration and education, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to grant and convey the selection to the State of Oregon for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned. In exchange for the selected lands the State shall reconvey and relinquish to the United States a good and sufficient title to an approximately equal area of unencumbered sections 16 and 36, or parts thereof, of substantial forest values satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, within the national forests of Oregon, granted to said State, or indemnity rights within such national forests to which the State is entitled therefor, and the lands reconveyed and relinquished as base lands shall immediately become parts of the national forest in which they are situated. The lands conveyed to the State shall be at all times subject to use by the United States for the construction, maintenance, and operation of roads, trails, telephone or telegraph lines needed in the administration of the contiguous national forest areas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETENTION OF UNIFORMS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I hope Senators will allow the Senate to take up at this time the bill with reference to the retention by discharged soldiers of their uniforms. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 13366) permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions.

Mr. President, the reason for asking for the immediate consideration of this bill is that these young men are going home now with the understanding that they will have to surrender their uniforms.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon what is the status of the legislation which has been suggested for the payment of a month's salary to the soldiers as they are discharged?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I was going to suggest as an amendment to this bill the amendment which was embodied in the revenue bill, which, I understand, is the amendment to which the Senator from Washington refers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was going to suggest that amendment, but I will be very glad if the Senator will suggest it. It struck me as being an opportunity to get some action upon that matter in circumstances which are more or less aggravated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment which was attached to the revenue bill was as follows:

That all officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, serving the United States in the war against Germany, who have been honorably discharged from the service since November 11, 1918, or who may hereafter be honorably discharged, shall be paid one month's salary in addition to the regular pay heretofore authorized.

Mr. FLETCHER. That amendment is in conference now, and I do not see anything to be gained by putting it on this bill. This is a House bill, and I wish we might pass it just exactly as it is so as to conclude the subject matter of this bill. I do not think we would make much headway by putting an amendment on this bill and having it go to conference. The revenue bill will undoubtedly pass eventually, and I do not believe there is any objection to the amendment referred to by the Senator from Oregon remaining on that bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I have not any doubt the conferees on the revenue bill will agree to the amendment to that bill to which reference has been made. That being the case, I doubt the wisdom of putting another amendment to the same effect upon this bill at this time.

Mr. KING. If the amendment be added to this bill, it will send the bill to conference.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, probably the suggestion of the Senator from Florida is a wise one, in view of the statement that this legislation will probably be agreed to by the conferees on the revenue bill; but I should like to say a word, to the effect that an important feature of this proposition is the need for prompt action. The need for this relief is now greater than it will be at any other time. The soldiers are being very rapidly discharged. Some soldiers can take care of themselves under any circumstances, and we hear no complaint from them; but soldiers come from the body of the people and represent all the varying types and conditions of men, and a great many of them, through causes sometimes over which they have no control whatever, and sometimes through the fault of the War Department in failing to pay them their salaries, in some cases salaries being delinquent for five or six months, are discharged from the Army with no funds whatever, and furnished the bare means of transportation back to some point which frequently is not their home. I know of cases where young men who had lived on the Pacific coast were sent back to Chicago because they happened to be enlisted in Chicago, 1,500 miles from home, without any money. That is discreditable to the Government, and it ought to be remedied as soon as possible.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand that unanimous consent has been given to have the bill considered. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of an additional section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 126 of an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 126. That an enlisted man discharged from the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps service, except by way of punishment for an offense, shall receive 5 cents per mile from the place of his discharge to his actual bona fide home or residence, or original muster into the service, at his option: Provided, That for sea travel on discharge, transportation and subsistence only shall be furnished to enlisted men."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if that is not the practice to-day?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; not quite. The law to-day is to pay three and a half cents a mile to men discharged from the Army, and 4 cents a mile to those discharged from the Navy. I think, however, this is paid only to the place of their muster in. They do not have the option of going to their homes, as suggested by my colleague a moment ago. It meets that situation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, my colleague is entirely correct in that statement, as I have it from the War Department authoritatively.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I know of some Texas soldiers who were ordered to San Francisco to be mustered out, when they could have been mustered out in Texas and would have preferred to have had that done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am going to offer the amendment that was attached to the revenue bill. I have no desire to claim the authorship of the amendment which was added to that bill. I think it was proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and he is entitled to any credit there may be for it; but I suggest it as an amendment to this bill, first, because I think it will hasten its enactment, and, second, because I think it is a very bad plan to put a lot of military legislation in revenue bills and in appropriation bills.

Mr. SMOOT. As long as this bill now has to go to conference anyhow, I see no particular objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There have been amendments attached as riders to appropriation bills seriously affecting the Army, some of which I might call attention to, but I am not going to do it now, and some of which would not have been made permanent statutes except for the fact that they went in as riders to appropriation bills. I think the proper place to have this amendment is in the present bill. I therefore offer it as an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That all officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps serving the United States in the war against Germany who have been honorably discharged from the service since November 11, 1918, or who may hereafter be honorably discharged shall be paid one month's salary in addition to the regular pay heretofore authorized.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I should like to see the amendment adopted that has been offered by the Senator from Oregon. I feel confident that it can not delay the matter. It will probably expedite the enactment into law of this provision, and will give relief to the soldiers at a time when a great many of them are sorely in need of it.

I hope, as I say, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The only question I have about it is that I should like to see a little bit more than 30 days' pay given; but it might delay and endanger the passage of this bill, and so I shall not offer that amendment. What I fear, however, is that when we adopt the 30 days' provision we will never give any additional pay. I doubt if 30 days' pay is enough.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ENLISTMENT IN REGULAR ARMY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is one other bill on the calendar that is of a good deal of importance to the Military Establishment at this time, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered. It is Senate bill 5279, to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistment in the Regular Army, and for other purposes. It is to remove restrictions against voluntary enlistments, which were practically abolished by the act of May 18, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5279) to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistment in the Regular Army, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of sections 7 and 14 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, as impose restrictions upon enlistments in the Regular Army, are herewith repealed in so far as they apply to enlistments and reenlistments in the Regular Army after the date of approval of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5236, to amend sections 7, 10, and 11 of the Federal reserve act, and section 5172, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The first amendment was, on page 2, after line 9, strike out:

SEC. 2. That that part of section 10 of the Federal reserve act which reads as follows: "The members of said board, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, and the Comptroller of the Currency shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank," be amended to read as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, and the Comptroller of the Currency shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank. The members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be ineligible during the time they are in office or during the term for which they were appointed to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 3, to change the number of the section from "3" to "2."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 9, after the word "power," to insert "from time to time by general ruling covering all districts alike," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That section 11 of the Federal reserve act as amended by the act of September 7, 1916, be further amended by striking out the whole of subsection (m) and by substituting therefor a subsection to read as follows:

"(m) Upon the affirmative vote of not less than five of its members the Federal Reserve Board shall have power from time to time by general ruling covering all districts alike to permit Federal reserve banks to discount for any member bank notes, drafts, or bills of exchange bearing the signature or indorsement of any one borrower in excess of the amount permitted by section 9 and section 13 of this act, but in no case to exceed 20 per cent of the member bank's capital and surplus.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 20, after the words "United States," to strike out "issued since April 24, 1917," so as to read:

Provided, however, That all such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange discounted for any member bank in excess of the amount permitted under such sections shall be secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds of the United States or certificates of indebtedness of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ought to say that the committee, at a subsequent conference, regretted the adoption of that amendment which struck out the words "issued since April 24, 1917," but it was not in position to take any formal action on the matter. I should like to have that amendment submitted for a vote of the Senate.

The inclusion of the words "issued since April 24, 1917," means that the privilege of using United States bonds as security for this purpose is limited to liberty bonds issued since we went into the war; and it was intended by the Federal Reserve Board to limit them to the use of those bonds for two reasons:

First, the 2 per cent bonds are not available. They are generally held by banks. Secondly, most of the liberty bonds are now selling at a considerable discount—94, 93, or something like that—and by making them desirable for purposes of security it was thought that the demand for them might be strengthened. Therefore the Federal Reserve Board desired to mention them specifically here by limiting the use of bonds for security purposes to liberty bonds.

I do not feel authorized to move to strike out that amendment, but I regret that the committee took that action. It was done rather hastily.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hope that amendment of the committee will not be agreed to. The explanation which the Senator from Nebraska has given shows that the object of this section is to make a special demand for the new liberty loan issue that is to be made in April; and by reason of that fact, by limiting the right here to the bonds that are issued after April 24, it gives that right. The Secretary of the Treasury and also Gov. Harding, of the Federal reserve bank, both assert that the very object and purpose is to make this aid and assist in floating the new liberty loan; and I will state that I propose to offer an amendment, following this, which will limit the provisions of the section to December 31, 1919.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, to what section is that offered?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The amendment which I am going to propose?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is to come in at the end of line 22 on page 3. They do not want to make the provisions of this bill applicable for all time. It is not a permanent matter; but they do want these bonds that can be hypothecated for the purpose of acting as security limited to the bonds issued after the beginning of the war, and they want the provisions of the act confined to the date of December 31, 1919.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in order to get this matter before the Senate, I ask that the committee amendment may be submitted to a vote.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I had been in the Chamber when this bill was called up I should have objected to its consideration at this time. I can not get the consent of my judgment to the increase to 20 per cent. I think it is vicious banking; and I say that with all due respect to the very eminent gentlemen who are members of this committee and favor it, as well as with all due respect to the Federal Reserve Board. I think it is wrong.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does the Senator refer to the fact of increasing the amount which can be discounted to 20 per cent instead of 10 per cent?

Mr. POMERENE. That is the fact to which I refer.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator understand that a national bank already has power to lend money to the extent of 20 per cent?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, yes, Mr. President. We had that matter up before the Senate some time ago, and I objected very strenuously to it at that time; and that is not in the law because of my support of it. I think we did the wrong thing then, and I do not propose by any vote of mine to extend that wrong any further. These bonds can be marketed if it is desirable; and it is not necessary to load up these banks with all of those securities, thereby increasing the amount of the indebtedness of a given member bank to the Federal reserve bank.

The argument was made, when the amendment to the national banking law was before the Senate, that particularly in the South they needed a greater line of credit; that it was necessary that 20 per cent of the capital stock and the surplus should be loaned to individuals as they would come in, and so forth; otherwise they could not do business. My answer to that suggestion is that if a man deserves credit equal to 20 per cent of the capital and surplus there are in every community two or more banks, and if his credit is sufficiently good he can go to one bank and get 10 per cent of its capital and surplus, and he can go to another bank and get 10 per cent of its capital and surplus. It is not necessary that he shall get into one bank to do these things.

Bank failures are not due to a great number of loans to a great number of individuals, no matter how careless the cashier may be in extending some of those loans; but bank failures come from loaning large sums of money to a few people. Never with my vote will I consent to allowing one borrower to have 20 per cent of the capital and surplus of a bank; neither will I facilitate that bank in getting credit to the extent of allowing it to go to the Federal reserve bank with these securities and get the 20 per cent.

I do not know that I could make myself clearer than I have in this brief statement. It represents my view about the matter. Perhaps I feel a little too keenly on this subject. At one time, years ago, I was made a victim of just that kind of banking. I think I know something about it, and there is not any man or any half-dozen men that can come in here, after the experience I have had, and tell me that that is good banking. I know better.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator may be able to go to two banks and get 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of both of those banks, but I will warrant that there is not one man out of a hundred that can do it. A man's banking transactions are generally confined to one bank, and the confidence which he establishes is with the officers of that bank.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, Mr. President; and it is the confidence between the officers of that bank and that borrower that robs communities.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; but you could not have any successful banking at all unless you had confidence between the officers of the bank and its depositors.

Mr. President, one of the difficulties in the way is that the laws of the various States prescribe various amounts that the State banks can loan, even in excess of 20 per cent of the capital and surplus of the bank. In other words, there are some banks that have no limitation whatever. Other banks are permitted to loan as high as 30 per cent, and that is one of the reasons why the State banks do not come into the national system. It is because under the national system 10 per cent is all that can be loaned to one man of the capital and surplus. Now, it seems to me that inasmuch as the member bank has a right now to borrow 20 per cent, and this law simply attempts to extend the right of the bank to discount that paper at the Federal reserve bank, when you take away that power you are crippling the national bank itself.

If this were simply a question of extending this matter from the beginning, the argument of the Senator would have more force; but when the member bank has the power to borrow to the extent of 20 per cent it does seem to me that to deprive the member bank of the ability to go to the reserve bank and discount that paper is impairing the banking facilities of the national banks, and consequently also of any State bank that might want to come into the system.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that the laws of the State of Ohio permit a State bank to loan to any single person or corporation an amount equal to 20 per cent of the capital and surplus. The Senator knows that the capital and surplus bear very slight relation to the lending power of a bank.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it was just one of those institutions that I referred to a while ago in my own experience. The fact that a thing happens in Ohio is prima facie evidence that it is right, but it is not always conclusive evidence.

Mr. McLEAN. It so happens that the average throughout the Union exceeds 20 per cent. In New York it is 25 per cent. In all the large States it is over 20 per cent, from 20 to 30 per cent, and the Senator knows that the capital and surplus bear but slight relation to the lending power of a bank. I know banks with $200,000 capital that lend over $13,000,000. The lending capacity of a bank depends largely upon its cash deposits.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true, but that is the exception to the rule.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. Some weeks since the Chair made an erroneous ruling. The Chair held that the unfinished business was not to be laid down at 2 o'clock on Calendar Monday. On a further examination of the rule the Chair reverses his ruling and lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator from Virginia to permit the unfinished business to be laid aside for a few minutes, so that we may finish the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am willing to have it laid aside for a few minutes only, but if there is to be any extended debate I shall ask to have the unfinished business proceeded with.

Mr. PENROSE. I sincerely hope the Senator from Virginia will insist on keeping the unfinished business before the Senate. I have some amendments to offer, and I have been waiting for a long while to get a chance to present them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that I will abandon the effort if it takes more than a few minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. All right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is really an emergency bill.

Mr. PENROSE. So is the unfinished business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have had it up for the second time. I want to say that this general provision here is really one which should have been looked after when the law was changed last September. The banks are still restricted to the 10 per cent loan in almost all cases. They are only allowed to advance as much as 20 per cent of their capital and surplus in these cases: First, when it refers to the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against the national exchange; second, the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, or corporation or firm negotiating the same; and, third, the purchase for discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like amount of United States bonds issued since April 24, 1917. The banks can make loans under those circumstances. All that this section does is to provide that when they make such loans under the authority of Congress the Federal reserve banks shall be permitted to discount paper. It certainly is not just and reasonable to permit banks to carry these loans and then compel them to hold them in their vaults like corpses, unable to use them and vitalize them. If it was at all desirable that they should be permitted to make loans under those circumstances, they ought to be allowed to use them for the purpose of discounts with the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. POMERENE. In answer to the argument just made by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, we were advised that the law we did pass was to prevent corpses from getting into member banks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not anything further to say. The question is before the Senate, and I do not want to impose on the time of the Senator from Virginia. I therefore ask the Chair to submit to a vote the recommendation of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the amendment should be voted down.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement has been made here that striking out the words "issued since April 24, 1917," would limit the bonds only to liberty bonds. That is not the case. There have been other bonds, farm-loan bonds, issued since that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am assuming that.

Mr. SMOOT. If you are going to deliberately limit it to liberty bonds, why not insert the word "liberty" after the word "of" and before the word "bonds," in line 20, so that it will read: "not less than a like face amount of liberty bonds of the United States"?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The other issue of bonds is a small and negligible matter, and I hope the Senator will not bring that up. We are anxious to get the bill through now. The purpose is to dispense with a market for liberty bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The other issue of bonds is small and negligible. I ask that the question be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment. In line 22, page 3, I wish to add, after the words "United States," the following:

The provisions of this section shall not be operative after December 31, 1919.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that is entirely acceptable to myself and other members of the committee. This is only intended to bridge over the present year so as not to strengthen the market for the liberty bonds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 22, after the words "United States," insert the words:

The provisions of this section shall not be operative after December 31, 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. It ought to be preceded by the words "Provided further."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will insert the words "Provided further."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 23, after the word "SEC.," change "4" to "3."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan to raise the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is detained by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], occasioned by illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is necessarily detained by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I think the taxpayers of the United States will be greatly astonished when they read in the morning papers that the Department of Agriculture is now at work framing a bill soon to be presented to Congress appropriating $1,250,000,000 to be used by the Food Administration in purchasing from the farmers the 1919 wheat crop at $2.26 a bushel. This remarkable situation, created by Mr. Hoover while he was in charge of the Food Administration of the United States, carries its own lesson as to the wisdom of the economic methods adopted by the Government during the war. Before I offer an amendment which I intend to propose to the pending bill I will ask the Secretary to read the article entitled "The Wheat Problem."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 20, 1919.]

THE WHEAT PROBLEM.

It is stated that the Department of Agriculture is now at work framing a bill, soon to be presented to Congress, appropriating $1,250,000,000 to be used by the Food Administration in purchasing from the farmers the 1919 wheat crop at $2.26 a bushel, the price guaranteed by the Government. It is proposed to sell this wheat to the public at the ruling market price, leaving the Government to stand the financial loss involved.

War involves many sacrifices, and the tremendous loss which the Government seems certain to sustain in its wheat deal is one of them. The agricultural interests of the country show no disposition to accept the sacrifice themselves, consequently there is no course for the Government to pursue other than to keep its word to purchase all wheat raised next year at the price stated. The appropriation proposed, all of which may be wiped out in the transaction, imposes a charge of $12.50 per capita upon the entire population of the country.

In accepting its responsibility for supplying food to the allies during the war the United States last year made a definite compact with the agricultural interests to buy the entire crop, as was done in 1918, at the same guaranteed price. This action was considered necessary in order to stimulate the planting of additional acreage in wheat. Production could only be increased by giving this guaranty, and the Government was obliged to proceed upon the theory that the war would last over into 1919 and perhaps longer. France, England, and Italy were taking all the wheat available in this country, without questioning the price, and would continue to do so for the period of the war.

Unfortunately for our Treasury, this Government had no agreement with its allies to continue the purchase of wheat at a specific price after the cessation of hostilities, and as a result they are now buying their wheat from Argentina and Australia, where it can be purchased at little more than half the price which the farmer receives for it in America. The wheat of the Argentine and Australia, while produced in plenteous supply, was not available during the war because of a lack of shipping, but the moment the armistice was signed England and France sent ships post haste to those countries to bring back cargoes of wheat, and now are taking from the United States only the quantity needed above that which they can secure from the south.

Thus the United States, loyal food purveyor to a stricken world, is left "holding the bag." Her word has been passed to the producers of wheat at home, and it must be kept. Contracts for steel, coal, transport, munitions, clothing, and many other items required by the war have been canceled by a stroke of the pen, but to date there has come no proposal to cancel the agreement made with the agricultural interests, nor has there been any proposal from the latter to compromise the agreement. Instead the Nation must pay either by the plan of buying at the Government price and selling at the market price, thus reducing the cost of living materially, or permitting the Government price to rule here, and thus sustaining the price of flour, bread, and other important and necessary items of living. In the end the public must pay. The farmer must have his price.

Far be it for the Government of the United States to stoop to a policy of repudiation. Its word is as good as its engraved bond. But one can not refrain from speculating why one Government contract is subject to cancellation and adjustment while another must be carried out to the letter.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, Mr. President, as some measure of relief to this unfortunate situation and in order to prevent persons under the direction of the President favoring this Argentine product or any other foreign article, while the American Government is being loaded up with wheat at a fixed price, I offer the following amendment to line 4, on page 2, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Let me ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he did not vote to fix the price of wheat at $2.50 a bushel?

Mr. PENROSE. I voted to make it $2.50 because I thought as long as the Government was engaged in the economic policy of fixing the price of wheat it ought to fix it at an adequate figure.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. You wanted to make it as big as possible?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I do not believe in price fixing, but I believe in a fair price if the price is to be fixed. I ask the Secretary to read the first amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the word "hereunder," insert "shall be used for the purchase of American wheat at the price guaranteed by the Government, and the preference in the purchase of other supplies shall, so far as reasonably possible, be in favor of American products."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it seems to me the amendment speaks for itself. According to the figures read by the Secretary, the American Government is likely to be responsible for $1,200,000,000 worth of wheat at the guaranteed price, and it may be that if the price of wheat keeps going down by reason of the foreign competition, which is coming into the world market by reason of the restoration of tonnage available for wheat conveyance, the price may go still further down. If we are to expend this $100,000,000 for purposes which, to my mind, have in no way been made clear, except the time-worn argument that they are required on account of the war, I think the Government might be relieved very consistently and properly of the enormous stores which they are compelled to take into their hands. I would be glad to hear what possible objection the Senator from Virginia can have to the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have a telegram from the American Mission at Paris, which states that—

Allies are willing and anxious to do all they can, and have and will contribute to the full extent of their resources, but it must be borne in mind that most of the food must be purchased in the United States, and American money would be used for such purchase and transportation.

So here is a declaration in advance of the purpose to buy most of this food in the American market.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator who makes that statement?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This is signed "Hoover, American Mission."

Mr. PENROSE. We have had Mr. Hoover's promises before.

Mr. GORE and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say in this connection, in view of this cablegram from Mr. Hoover, we had a witness, Mr. Taliaferro, before the Committee on Agriculture this morning who is vice president of the Hammond Standish Packing Co., of Detroit, and he told us that Mr. Hoover was in Europe now and that this $100,000,000, or a great deal of it, was to be used in stabilizing the price of packing-house products, so that the packers could dispose of the stocks they have on hand and obviate a loss.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if he or any Senator here present knows whether Mr. Hoover is an American citizen and ever voted in this country in his life?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not propose to be drawn into such an irrelevant discussion as that. I do not know anything about Mr. Hoover's citizenship. I have no doubt myself that he is a citizen of this country, but I have not been a detective upon his tracks and I am not posted about his career. I do not know of what country he is a citizen, but I have no doubt myself he is a citizen of the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. He abused the high office which he holds informally by advising the American people to support the Democratic Party in the last election, and in that way, in my opinion, insulted every Republican in the country, after having been intrusted with these enormous powers, to get into a political campaign. I do not believe he is a citizen of the United States. He has spent the greater part of his life in England. He may perchance have been born here; I do not know. It is bad enough to have a man called upon to administer this enormous fund and the enormous funds which he has already administered who has taken no oath of office and whose allegiance even is in doubt, in the opinion of many citizens; as to whether he is not at bottom really an Englishman and not an American.

I intend to offer an amendment when the pending amendment is disposed of to provide that this vast expenditure shall be defrayed in an orderly, legal way by commissioners appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and receiving a salary, after having taken the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator whether I am correct in understanding his statement that he voted for the Gore amendment which fixed the price of wheat at $2.50 a bushel?

Mr. PENROSE. My position was plain at the time, and I have no objection to explaining it now.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator will allow me a word, and he can explain in a minute.

Mr. GORE. That was last year's crop and not this year's.

Mr. PENROSE. I was against price fixing during the war. I believe it did more harm than good all along the line. Had the war continued another year it would have led to general economic demoralization. But when it was evident that prices were to be fixed, I favored a price that, in my opinion, was fair and adequate. That was my position, and I think——

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator know what the added price to the Government guaranty would have been if the Gore amendment had been passed?

Mr. PENROSE. If we had not fixed the price, in my opinion, the price of wheat would have been more than the guaranteed price.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say at this point to the Senator from Colorado that the price of $2.50 for wheat applied to the crop harvested in 1918. It has no relation, either direct or indirect, to the harvest of 1919. No amendment was offered as to the crop of 1919, and the Senate never voted upon that proposition. That was done by the President of the United States alone upon his responsibility under section 14 of the so-called food-control act. The Senate did not express any opinion as to what the price for the 1919 crop should be.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if it is not a fact that the bill which passed Congress provided for a guaranty of $2 a bushel only for the year 1918?

Mr. GORE. For the year 1918.

Mr. KELLOGG. No bill passed Congress providing for $2.50 a bushel for 1919.

Mr. GORE. No, sir; it did not.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill, as I understand it, authorized the President, if in his opinion it was necessary to encourage production, to make a guaranty, but the bill itself provided that the guaranty for 1918 should be not less than $2 per bushel.

Mr. GORE. Not less than $2 per bushel.

Mr. KELLOGG. As a matter of fact, the President fixed the price for that year at $2.20 a bushel at the primary market.

Mr. GORE. Congress did not project the law in expressing prices further into the future than 1918.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then in 1918, in September, before the sowing of the crop, the President published a proclamation fixing the price for 1919 at $2.26 at the highest primary market and graded down from that.

Mr. GORE. Yes; September 2.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, inasmuch as the article has been read into the RECORD indicating a blanket loss of $1,200,000,000 to the American people by reason of the guaranty of the price of wheat, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Virginia what would be the price of wheat to-day without that guaranty? How do you figure your losses, and if you figure your losses at all what are you going to allow for the losses of the farmer below the market price in 1918 to meet the excess that he would receive by reason of the guaranty of 1919? In other words, taking his crops of 1918 and 1919 together, would he have received more by reason of this guaranty, or would he have received more for the entire crop of the two years if we had allowed the crop to be sold at the guaranteed price? I do not want anyone to forget for a single moment that the farmer lost a dollar a bushel on his grain in 1918. I say that that has not been made up even by the guaranty of 1919. So the abominable criticism of the farmer's attitude as compared with the attitude of other lines of business does not seem to me to be warranted, for let us remember right here that we were engaged in a war in September, 1918. We did not know what the future would be in 1919. We might be engaged in a war during all of this year, and we prepared for the future by guaranteeing a price that would assure the utmost number of bushels that could possibly be produced. Now you criticize us because it might have been a little less.

Are you criticizing the Government in any way for the $500,000,000 that it is going to lose on the railroads this year by reason of increasing the price of freight and for carrying passengers? If you criticize the price fixed for the farmer's product, $1,200,000,000 even, have you not raised the price of everything that he must purchase with that product by reason of raising the prices of labor throughout the country, with that $1,200,000,000? Have you not raised it more than $3,000,000,000, compared to the price of the things that the farmer must buy, taking the country as a whole?

We paid enormous prices for places at which to build ships—three or four times, probably, what the land could otherwise have been purchased for. We paid at least some three to five times what it would have cost in peace periods to build our shipways. Now they are of no use to us, but they are going to cost the country billions of dollars. Are you criticizing the Government because the Government proceeded to pay those enormous sums?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I did not expect to yield the floor for the remainder of the day.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; but I expected the Senator would yield the floor until at least one side of this proposition could be presented even briefly, and that is the farmer's side of the question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The only criticism that has been made was the speech delivered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who criticized maintaining the price of wheat at $2.26 a bushel.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] does not think that I have been criticizing the farmer for getting a fair price for his wheat.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, I do not; but I criticize and I resent the article which the Senator put in the RECORD, which seemed to indicate that the farmer was the only person who had been benefited by this war, and that, therefore, he is receiving more than his just due.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course, if the Senator from Virginia will permit me, a price was fixed on copper, on wages, on railroad transportation, and on a number of other things, which I think was wrong economically, and was a wrong economic method. I saw nothing while we were in the war to cause us to interfere very materially with the course of trade and normal conditions, but that is over.

While I am on my feet, I want to remind the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], in the first place, I voted against the food-control bill on the floor of the Senate. I was one of five or six Senators who voted against that bill, and it has been a very gratifying vote for me to refer to since the bill was passed when I have been visited by many hundred people from Pennsylvania—I may say many thousands—who have been subjected to harassment and vexation and utter failure to get any satisfaction from the Food Department concerning their very many grievances.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] was aiming his criticism at an article in a Washington newspaper. There is nothing that has been said on the floor of the Senate to invite his attack.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to indicate that when the Government has ordered 27,000,000 undershirts, which it has now on hand, on which there will be an entire loss, there ought not to be criticism of the farmer because he will receive a portion of what the Government compelled him to lose in 1918.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But, Mr. President, no one on the floor of the Senate has criticized the farmer; I have not heard one criticism of the farmer or of the price of wheat. The only criticism has been made in an article in a Washington newspaper, and I understand now that the Senator from North Dakota is making a criticism on the article in that paper. Certainly I do not take his criticism to myself, for I have not said a word on the subject. The Senator looked over this way very intently at me as if he were about to make an attack on me for something, but I could not imagine what it was for.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Virginia was so generous and his countenance was so smiling that he invited my glance in that direction.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This is the first time my countenance has arrested attention here, so far as I know. I am obliged to the Senator.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who tried to put the price of wheat at $2.50, has seemed to me to be the only man making the attack. He is making an attack on $2.26 wheat, although he tried to put it at $2.50. I have no brief to defend either position. It is entirely irrelevant to the question before the Senate.

But addressing myself for just a very few moments to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, it seems that he wants to do an act of charity or of generosity accompanied with a condition of profiteering. He is willing to appease hunger and stay the ravages of death as an act of benevolence and charity, provided he can make some money out of it. In the ultimate analysis that is what the Senator's position is, and that is all there is in it. He wants to make this appropriation provided he can get a certain price for wheat. I think it is a very ungenerous act to do. We are told that it is expected to spend this money in the United States, and I should be very glad to see that done; but for my part I am unwilling to put that condition on this donation, on this charity, on this benevolent act—to put on it a condition that we must make some money out of it or we will not do it. That is, as I understand it, the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, I think he fails to grasp the situation. As I understand, the Government must take up all this wheat at $2.26 a bushel. Having it in its possession, I very modestly suggest, to relieve the expenditure of the Treasury in some small amount, that we put this wheat through this revolving fund, and send it over to Europe.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the Senator from Pennsylvania, and possibly the Senator from Virginia, overlook the fact that if we purchase all of this $100,000,000 worth of goods in this country it is going to weigh very heavily on and embarrass very much the people of this country, who are in great need of food. One of the great necessities now in large portions of the country is the very material which it is now proposed to send to Europe. While I have no doubt that a large portion of it will be purchased here, I say that by every million dollars' worth of goods that you purchase in this country you are going to raise the price just that much higher to those who are now unable to buy the necessaries of life.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is no doubt about the fact that this $100,000,000 would be a mere bagatelle in taking up the surplus foodstuffs the United States now has on its hands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia talks about the surplus foodstuffs. Where are they? In whose possession and control are they? We are informed by the press dispatches that riots have already begun in cities where people are demanding wages and demanding bread. Where is this food which is a surplus? It is in the hands of a very few people. It has been gathered up and is now being held while the people are in need of it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Statisticians all say there is a large surplus of foodstuffs in this country—wheat, corn, fats of all kinds, bacon and pork, and lard and oils—that all foodstuffs are abundant in this country.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, it is an inexplicable situation, if that be true, because if there is an abundance, a surplus, why, in the name of all the gods at once, are the prices such as they are in this country at the present time?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. One reason is that the Government has fixed $2.26 for wheat.

Mr. BORAH. The Government has not fixed prices except as to two or three articles.

Mr. LODGE. It has fixed the price of wheat.

Mr. BORAH. We are not discussing the price of wheat alone. There is a vast amount of foodstuffs in this country other than wheat. I know, and other Senators here know, where these vast food supplies and reservoirs of food are. They are not within the reach of the masses of the people of this country; and when you purchase these food supplies in this country you are not benefiting anyone in the way of the masses of the people at all; you are only raising their prices and disparaging their situation, rather than benefiting it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virgina. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. It seems to me that the Senator from Idaho does not grasp the point which I have in my mind.

Mr. BORAH. I may not grasp the point the Senator had in his mind, but I grasped the point I had in my mind.

Mr. PENROSE. I understood the Senator's point to be as to the price fixing for wheat, that the consumer can not get wheat below $2.26 a bushel, because if wheat sinks below that point the Government comes in and takes it. Senators from States where wheat-growing is more a specialty than it is in Pennsylvania—although that is a great wheat-growing State—who may be more familiar with the matter, some of my colleagues in my neighborhood, say I am entirely right. In that case the consumer is not hurt in America by having the Government relieved of some of the surplus wheat. That there is a surplus I take to be granted, because the Department of Agriculture is preparing a bill carrying this enormous sum—$1,200,000,000—to take up the wheat, and the newspaper article I referred to states that the restoration of tonnage suitable for the conveyance of wheat has brought so much wheat into the market that its price is rapidly dropping.

Mr. REED, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the Senator from Missouri first addressed the Chair, and I yield to him; but I hope Senators will not make long speeches while I have the floor, though I shall be glad to yield for any reasonable question or suggestion.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he had yielded the floor. I desire recognition for two or three minutes in my own right, as I am compelled to leave the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Arizona when the Senator from Virginia yields the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rose to ask a question. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] inquired where these reservoirs of food were. Is it not a fact that the statement has been made that the meats or fats necessary to supply Europe are already on hand in enormous quantities. I am asking the Senator if that is not the case? Has not that statement been made to the committee?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understand there is a very large surplus of meat.

Mr. REED. And those fats are in the hands of the packers, are they not?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I presume the bulk of them are in the hands of the packers; I do not know.

Mr. REED. My recollection is that the statement was made that there are $50,000,000 worth—perhaps the Senator has the figures——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; I have not.

Mr. REED. My recollection is—and I hesitate to use the figures, because I did not charge my mind especially with them—that there are $50,000,000 worth of fats on hand.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is about correct. I have the statement here somewhere.

Mr. REED. If that is true, then will the Senator permit me to say in his time that the benefit of the market which is to be made would not go to the farmer, for the farmer has already parted with the hogs out of which the fats are made, but it would go to the packers, and of course the tendency would be to keep up the retail price on similar products in this country? If the packers have $50,000,000 worth of fats on hand, it may explain why bacon is 50 cents a pound, which I think is about the price in Washington to-day.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask a question simply for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. The question of wheat, I think, is fairly clear, because that was a fixation of price by law; but were not prices fixed by the Food Administration on fats, meats, and other articles? I do not mean by law, but by agreement, as it was called?

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Virginia will pardon me, there was no price fixed even on wheat.

Mr. LODGE. Not strictly, but there was a minimum fixed.

Mr. REED. The law guaranteed a minimum price——

Mr. LODGE. That is what I should have stated.

Mr. REED. Of, I think, $2 a bushel. Is not that correct?

Mr. GORE. Yes; that was for the year 1918.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct; I stated it inexactly, but I know what was done.

Mr. REED. And the Government has not guaranteed anything for the year 1919, has it?

Mr. GORE. The President has, but Congress has not.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; there is no legal guaranty on wheat now.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it amounts to a legal guaranty. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the President, on September 2 last, issued a proclamation guaranteeing, under the law, the price of $2.26 for the crop of 1919. The President had authority to issue such a proclamation, and it amounts to a binding obligation, I think, upon the Government.

Mr. REED. Much as I have tried to keep track of the colors of this kaleidoscope, I have not been able to follow them all. The fact about the pork question, as I gather from the evidence that has been submitted from time to time, is that Mr. Hoover called in the packers and arranged with the packers the price they would pay the farmer, arranged with the packers the price at which they were to sell to the retailers, and arranged with the packers the profits they were to take. As a result of that, the farmers were at one time pretty much in rebellion about the prices they were getting, and the people have been in rebellion, I think, all the time about the prices they have been compelled to pay; but the packer, according to the report filed here by the Federal Trade Commission, if he be not complacent, ought to be, because his profits have been simply astounding. So that we may as well understand that the market that will be made for pork under this provision, will be a market made for that pork which has left the hands of the farmer and which is in the hands of the packers.

Mr. GORE and Mr. ASHURST addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a question, but I am not through.

Mr. GORE. I am uncertain whether the Senator from Missouri was in the Chamber when I made a statement a few moments ago.

Mr. REED. I was not in the Chamber at that time; I have just come in.

Mr. GORE. It related to that point. I may say that Mr. Taliaferro, who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture this morning, the vice president of the Hammond-Standish Packing House Co., of Detroit, stated that England has imported a great deal of salted meat, which was not grateful to the appetite of the English people; that they were now not willing to consume it and would not consume it; that it was the purpose to sell this salted meat to the people of southern Europe, to whom it was palatable and who use it, I think, in cooking vegetables; and that the English, by disposing of this surplus supply of salted meat on hand, would create a market in England for more palatable meat.

He also stated that this $100,000,000, he understood, was to be used by Mr. Hoover in creating a market in Europe for packing-house products and stabilizing prices of packing-house products so as to protect the packers of this country against loss. That is the substance of what he said. I ask permission to print in the RECORD an extract from Mr. Taliaferro's statement upon that point.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will for a reasonable time; but I do not wish to stand here all evening.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It was difficult for us to hear the latter part of the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma as to the uses to which this $100,000,000 were to be put. The Senator's head was turned away from this side of the Chamber, so that we were unable to hear him distinctly; and, with the permission of the Senator from Virginia, may I ask if the Senator from Oklahoma will again state what the understanding or agreement is as to how this money is to be spent?

Mr. GORE. I will say that a portion of it, according to the testimony of the witness who appeared before the Agricultural Committee this morning, was to be used in stabilizing the market, creating a market for packing-house products, and to stabilize the price of those products, so as to protect the packing houses against a loss as to the meat supply which they have on hand, manufactured from hogs which they purchased at 17½ cents.

Mr. THOMAS. By what authority did he speak?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Who was the witness?

Mr. GORE. His name is Thomas W. Taliaferro, and he is vice president and general manager of the Hammond-Standish Packing Co., of Detroit, Mich. I have requested permission to have printed a portion of his statement covering this proposition in order that he may be allowed to speak for himself and in order that the exact statement may be furnished to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[Excerpt from statement of Thomas W. Taliaferro, vice president and general manager of Hammond-Standish Co., of Detroit, before Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry January 20, 1919.]

Senator KENYON. You would not be in favor of the Government operating the packing houses even if it bought the business?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Would I? I would not have anything to say about it. It would not change the principle of the thing.

Senator KENYON. No.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. But I would suggest right there, Senator, that if the Government has any idea of that kind they better wait until they bury the white elephant of the wheat crop of 1920 before they start to work on the packing business, because when they bury that elephant they will not want any more in the shape of the packing business

Senator KENYON. There are some white elephants on the railroad question, are there not?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Not only there, but there is a Hog Island and some others that I can mention, which I do not mention—which I do not mention here—and, gentlemen, if you please, I will just finish my statement. There is only a short way to go.

To my mind this bill means ultimate Government ownership and nothing else, and if the Government wants our business, let it take it now, while it is alive and progressive and has an efficient organization, and pay us a fair value for it, and not handicap, disorganize, and rupture it, and then take it a wreck of its former self.

I know what trying to operate under license would mean, and I want none of it. My business is legitimate and necessary for the country, and I want to run it in my own way, like every other free American citizen operates his business. Why should we have such restrictions thrown around us that would brand us as lawbreakers, either stated or implied?

We are not parties to any agreement in buying our live stock or selling our products.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize that among all of the essential elements entering into the winning of the war the supplying of meats is the only one that will not cost the Government immense sums of money in burying the white elephant of incompleted contracts and necessarily wasteful methods brought about by haste. The packers supplied the necessary food often on a cost-minus instead of a cost-plus basis, but you have had no complaint from them. This is patriotism, pure and simple—patting ourselves on the back—and I hope this honorable committee will unite in saying to our industry, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joys of your reward," and breathe the air of freedom like the nations of Europe whom you helped to liberate.

I am now ready, gentlemen, to answer any questions you want to ask.

Senator KENYON. How has the license of the Food Administration worked in your business?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Has it worked?

Senator KENYON. Yes.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. So far I have no objections. If the present price is maintained and there are not sufficiency of orders forthcoming, the packers are going to be compelled to stand the biggest loss, in my estimation, that they ever stood, and probably a great many of them will be seriously crippled.

Senator KENYON. Just what do you mean by that? Are there great quantities of meat products in the cold-storage houses now?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. At the present time the products, while ample, are pretty well taken care of by allied orders.

Senator KENYON. Do you know anything about the statements made in the paper here the other night that the allies had repudiated their contracts for pork, or their agreement as to pork, and were getting their meat from the Argentine?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Senator, the British Government is the one you refer to?

Senator KENYON. Yes; that is the Government I refer to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They have an enormous stock of meats on hand, primarily caused not by their buying, but having stored last summer, when the dangers of transportation were adrift, a large quantity of meat in salt, which usually would be shipped in borax, accumulating in England meats just because it was meats, with the idea of having it carry as long as possible without refrigeration. This produced a very salty article, and if there is anything in the world that the Englishman dislikes it is a salty piece of bacon, and he will not eat it. But under the stress of war conditions he might possibly have been forced to eat it. However, now that the armistice has been signed, he feels very differently about it, and he will not eat it. And in connection with a great many laboring men being thrown out of positions and their buying power restricted, they have stopped eating it, and the consumption, as I understand it, in December in Great Britain was only about 16,000 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. It ought to have been what?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. About 48,000 or 50,000 tons to be normal.

The CHAIRMAN. Of what sorts of meat?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Of bacon; that is, of hog meats.

The CHAIRMAN. It looks to me like that would create an extraordinary demand for saltless meat.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes; but their stocks over there are largely undesirable meats for English outlet, and that lessens the demand and keeps these enormous stocks going into the avenues of distribution.

Senator NORRIS. If their stock consists of meat they can not eat, would that not create a greater demand here for meat they could eat?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The Food Administration in their endeavor to increase production and to conserve the supply did everything possible to curtail the domestic consumption, so as to make these stocks available. The armistice being signed at least 6 months or, perhaps, 12 months earlier than the most ardent patriot expected has produced a condition that is very critical, because we had gone ahead and built and worked for something that we expected to happen in the future, but it has happened right away.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not see this point, Mr. Taliaferro. You say they find, the war being over, that they have got a lot of meat on hand that they would have to keep if the war had continued?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They would have had to have eaten.

The CHAIRMAN. But that they will not eat now. So this deadhead stuff that they have on hand there which they will not eat and you could not sell looks to me like, to the extent they can not eat it, there would be a demand for more meat.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. But the British Government, owning this meat, will not increase their further orders until this supply is reduced and their facilities enlarged.

The CHAIRMAN. They are trying to force them to eat it?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They are trying to force them to eat it; they have got to force it, in self-preservation.

Senator NORRIS. Do you think they will keep on that way until the people of England are forced and do eat that meat that they do not want?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Gradually that will happen. But between now and the time it does something is going to happen to us.

Senator GORE. They want to take care of the $100,000,000 that is to be sent there as far as they can?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understand that is a part of the use England makes of that $100,000,000 revolving fund.

The CHAIRMAN. They are going to give these folks meat that they can not eat?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understand they are going to relieve themselves of part of it.

Senator KENYON. Are we going to buy part of it?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. No. This meat, while salty, is perfectly agreeable and highly prized by southern European nations. They like their meat salty, because they boil it with vegetables.

Senator NORRIS. This meat could be sent to Italy?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. And the Czechs.

Senator NORRIS. And the Czecho-Slovacs, and it would be very acceptable to them?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Most certainly, but they have not the money.

The CHAIRMAN. And England would send it to those people instead of forcing it down the throats of their own people?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They have not the money. These people have something to eat, and they have not the money with which to buy it, and we have the meat and we do not want to send it without the money.

The CHAIRMAN. You have the meat and money both?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Exactly so.

Senator KENYON. And we are to send them the money to buy the meat?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Sending them the money to buy the meat; we have been doing that right along.

Senator NORRIS. They have not the money, but want to buy this salty meat, and we are to send them the money to buy it with?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They have not the credit.

Senator NORRIS. Who is going to buy this?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I understand from the newspapers that Mr. Hoover is making some arrangements, of the details of which I am not advised.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know anything about the ration of meat and bread he is furnishing these people?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. No, Senator; I do not.

Senator GRONNA. In reality there is an oversupply of meats at the present time?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. There is an oversupply immediately available for the amount of consumption that is apparent.

Senator KENYON. And if we do not get rid of that oversupply the packers are going to be in a bad way?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They are going to be compelled to stop. We are only operating in one door and carrying it out the other. If any link of that chain is broken, the weakest one, the whole thing stops.

Senator GRONNA. Has that oversupply caused any change in prices?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Has it made any change in prices?

Senator GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Not yet, Senator; but it is likely to make an awful change in prices if the outlet is stopped. If you dam the river up at its outlet instead of its source, you are going to have trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. You figure if this meat can be used and disposed of to the southeastern Europeans that that demand will relieve this congestion of meat and it will enable the packers to keep running and supply the demand for fresh meat in England?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It will; that is the secret of the whole thing, Senator, that the continuity of events must not be interrupted in any one particular, not from the producer on the farm to the consumer in Europe.

Senator KENYON. If they did not get the consumer in Europe and these products were thrown upon the market the consumer would get meat a little cheaper, would he not?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. He certainly would.

Senator KENYON. But you think it would make a smash among the packers?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It would make a smash among the producers and packers, too.

Senator KENYON. Both together?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. You can not pare that potato without taking off something from each fellow. Everyone will have to suffer if that happens. The apparent suffering will be, of course, on the man who owns the biggest amount of product, which will be the packer. The packer has no guaranty that this stuff he is paying 17½ cents for is going to be taken off his hands. There is no guaranty. The Food Administration has not given us a guaranty on that. They have just told us, "Go ahead. You are a patriotic bunch of fellows, and pack these hogs on the basis of 17½, and we are going to get orders for you." But they do not give us any insurance policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hoover was instrumental in giving those assurances?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I want to say one thing for Mr. Hoover; that I have been under him—in connection with the license—and I have seen that gentleman under the most adverse circumstances, the most trying circumstances, and I want to say that he is one of the grandest men I know of; that he has done more good to the producers of this country than any other man in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The packers pretty generally agree in that opinion?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I do not know. They know worth when they see it.

Senator KENYON. Was meat and money the only things he talked over with the packers?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It has all been a matter of our risking our money against their promise of their ability to relieve us of the product.

Senator KENYON. Do you not think now, with Mr. Hoover over there insisting on this $100,000,000, that he is keeping faith with you?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I certainly do, or I would not be buying hogs; and I will go the limit on what he says, and that is the reason I am spending my good money on hogs. I know I will lose a lot of money on it if anything should slip.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not think there is any "white elephant" thrown out to the packers in the way of a guaranty?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They have not guaranteed us.

The CHAIRMAN. But they let you make 9 and 15 per cent.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They let us make 1 per cent; that is what they let us make.

The CHAIRMAN. On what?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. On our business.

The CHAIRMAN. On your turnover?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. On our turnover.

The CHAIRMAN. What did you make on your capital stock last year?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. We made $117,000, is what we made on $21,000,000 worth of business.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not mean that. The $21,000,000 is not the point of my inquiry. What is the amount of your capital stock?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Our capital stock is $884,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And you made $117,000 on it?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes; and an odd $3,000,000 you want to figure in.

Senator GRONNA. That $117,000 was net profit?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. That is net; yes, sir; and if it had been much less there would not have been any net. I was saying that we did $21,000,000 worth of business and only made $100,000.

Senator GRONNA. That is more than 12 per cent.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. On what?

Senator GRONNA. On $800,000 capital stock.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. But you must take my borrowed money in with it.

Senator GRONNA. After you pay interest. You have paid the interest. That is all figured in. You were saying here that that is net?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. After paying interest on borrowed money.

Senator GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Why, sure.

Senator GRONNA. That is all taken into consideration.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I pay wages, too, do I not, Senator?

Senator NORRIS. But you do not pay the wages out of the 12 per cent; but after paying the wages you had left 12 per cent.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. No; I would have been paying laborers wages yet if I had tried that.

Senator GRONNA. Are the income taxes included, and you still have $117,000 net?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I think our actual——

Senator GRONNA. I mean after the income taxes have been paid.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Twenty-five thousand dollars income taxes are to be paid.

Senator GRONNA. I think that is a very fair question. I would like to know if the income taxes are included in expenses, after paying which it leaves you $117,000?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It was not included in expenses, but written off as reserve.

Senator GRONNA. That is the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. A hundred and how many thousands?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Let me give you the actual figures, as long as we are getting down to it. This is our 1918 statement—$117,000, as near as I can remember.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that include or exclude income tax and your war or excess-profits tax?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. That figures what we carried to our surplus account.

Senator WADSWORTH. Taxes paid?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Taxes paid.

The CHAIRMAN. How much was your corporation income tax?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Income tax—we do not know yet, but probably in the neighborhood of $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And your excess or war-profits tax will be how much?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I do not know. We only wrote off $25,000 to cover our war-profits taxes; there will not be any profit tax.

Senator NORRIS. That means you set aside $25,000 to pay those taxes, and after you had done that you had 12 per cent?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Oh, no; I said we had a little over 1 per cent on the business we did.

Senator NORRIS. On the capital stock, I'm talking about.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. On our capital stock?

Senator NORRIS. Yes. After you had set aside the $25,000 to pay taxes, you still had $117,000 net profit. Was that it?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. We carried to surplus about $117,000.

* * * * * * *

Senator KENYON. When this matter occurred that you speak of with Britain, did you packers have a meeting with Mr. Hoover about it, along in October last?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. We have had a number of meetings with him, Senator.

Senator KENYON. Did you not have one meeting with him to talk over that matter of large pork products on hand in connection with Britain?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes; we had.

Senator KENYON. That meeting was in October last, was it not?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes.

Senator KENYON. And did Mr. Hoover at that time tell you he would do what he could to stabilize the situation?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. He always has taken that position.

Senator KENYON. And when he went abroad, did you understand he was going to try to work out some plan to do that?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I did not know at that meeting that he intended to go abroad, but I afterwards understood from the papers that he was abroad, and from the reports in the trade that he had gone abroad.

Senator KENYON. That question was discussed at that meeting?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The question which was discussed at that meeting was the available number of orders in pounds that might be forthcoming.

Senator KENYON. From abroad?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. From abroad, to counterbalance the expected receipts of hogs, which would probably be about 25 or 30 per cent, as we figure, increase over last year.

Senator KENYON. And this question of keeping faith with the packers on the prices they have paid for hogs, that was discussed?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Being paid?

Senator KENYON. If there was not some way to dispose of the products, the packers would have these products and lose great amounts of money?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Oh, surely; that was the basis on which the discussion rested.

Senator KENYON. Who was present at that meeting?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Well, there were representatives of the different packing houses, I suppose 25 or 30 or maybe 40, and about 25 representatives from the producers or producers' committees, or something on that order; ex-Gov. Stuart was one.

Senator KENYON. What committee did he represent?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I think he is a sort of chairman of the agricultural advisory committee.

Senator KENYON. Was any plan decided on at that time?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes; it was agreed that the prices of hogs, as far as possible, would be maintained, I think at 17½ cents basis. I think that is the meeting at which we agreed that if we had these orders we would be able and would pay 17½.

Senator KENYON. What was the discussion at that meeting about the nation of Great Britain?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. At that meeting, Britain, as I remember now, had in hand a very heavy order for provisions; I think in the neighborhood of 179,000 tons.

Senator KENYON. Of meat?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Of meat and lard; that is, they had that at that time and did later place it.

Senator KENYON. What I asked you about was this: I understood you to say there was a discussion of Britain's action as to canceling contracts for pork. Was there anything about that?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Britain, to my knowledge, has never gone back on or canceled a contract since that Government was established, and it never will.

Senator KENYON. You misunderstood me a while ago or I misunderstood you. I understood you had a meeting because of this situation that had arisen over cancellation of contracts. I do not know whether they canceled contracts. I share in your estimation of Britain.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. No, Senator, they did not cancel any contracts, but they said at that meeting they expected the orders would continue. We had been operating on that basis, and the operations fell off.

Senator KENYON. I saw in the paper that they were canceling contracts.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. The paper was wrong.

Senator KENYON. They expected to keep on ordering?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They expected; I feel sure they honestly expected to have these additional orders.

The CHAIRMAN. But simply did not make contracts that you expected they would make?

(No response.)

Senator KENYON. There were no contracts broken. I do not think Britain is breaking any contracts

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Britain would not break contracts.

Senator KENYON. That situation has arisen now, with all this surplus, and you must find a market for your surplus?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. We have to have a market for our surplus.

Senator KENYON. And this $100,000,000 will help to find a market for your surplus?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. $100,000,000 does not go very far. That is a revolving fund, and therefore it merely takes up the slack between the producer and the consumer—between the packer and the man who eats the meat in Europe. That revolving fund can be used over and over again as long as it only covers the slack between the packer and consumption there.

Senator KENYON. Of course, it can be used longer as a revolving fund than if it is absolutely given away.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. And if it is used as a revolving fund I should say it would help the situation very much.

Senator KENYON. It would not help very far if given away.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It would not help very far if given away and no returns came back from it. But my understanding is that it is being used as a revolving fund; the meat goes to the people, and they in turn will present securities or money value that can be cashed or used again in getting more supplies.

Senator KENYON. Where did you get that understanding?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It is my own personal understanding. That is what I naturally would understand or figure that if I had anything to do with it; that is, that would probably fit the case.

The CHAIRMAN. That will let you out on your 17½-cent contracts?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. We have an agreement to pay 17½ cents for hogs, and other markets in proportion to that, until the 1st of February.

The CHAIRMAN. And that will take care of the stocks which you have on hand which you purchased on that basis, and also take care of the producers which are selling in the meantime?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Yes; to a large extent. I do not think it will do it, but it will act as an insurance policy for a large percentage of the profits that to-day has been put down under the 17½ cents.

The CHAIRMAN. If this were a larger revolving fund, it might be able to keep the prices of flour up so as to obviate this "white elephant"?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Oh, no. You would have to have a revolving fund of a billion dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. That is too big a white elephant.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. There is not any place around here where you can bury it.

The CHAIRMAN. That white elephant crept in because of violation of fundamental laws of supply and demand?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. That crept in because you signed the armistice the 17th of November instead of the 17th of next July.

The CHAIRMAN. And if you have to jump that much, it is not very good economy after all.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It is not anybody's fault, and I had rather see the Government pay it than not to have the wheat if we needed it.

The CHAIRMAN. I will not go into that, but we might have obviated it if we had let the people get what their wheat was worth in 1917 and 1918 and let them get what it is worth this year.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. We did not know what wheat would be worth to us. Wheat is worth a whole lot to a man who is starving; and if our armies over there needed wheat I would be in favor of giving it to them if it cost $10 to raise it and give it to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The farmers would raise it at $10.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. And would not think he got enough for it if he got $10.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the farmer has been about as conservative as the packers or anybody else in estimating their receipts.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They are the best posted men in this country to-day. They do not need anybody to help them.

Mr. GORE. I also ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD an article from the Washington Times of the same import.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

REAL REASONS WHY PRESIDENT ASKS PASSAGE OF FOOD BILL.

The real reasons for the insistence by President Wilson on the immediate passage of the appropriation of $100,000,000 for food for Europe became apparent to-day, when the following facts were learned:

1. There are 36 cargoes of food of a value of $55,000,000 already in Europe or on the way, and not one pound of them can be used until the United States Treasury has sufficient guaranty that all the shipments will be paid for.

2. Great Britain, whose contracts have been in large part the basis of Government fixed prices for pork products in this country, has suddenly and unexpectedly suspended all orders which were scheduled for January shipment.

To throw all this pork on the American market would ruin all but the strongest packing houses.

WOULD AVOID UNREST.

The real reasons for the Presidents' insistence are to avoid the spread of unrest in starving Europe by providing food and to avert an industrial and financial disturbance in the United States by furnishing an outlet for the immense store of pork products now in hand.

Members of both House and Senate have been demanding more explicit instructions regarding the President's request. They have been unable to understand why the President has been so insistent and why he wanted the appropriation rushed through Congress and made immediately available.

If the Senate agrees to the hundred million appropriation—it has passed the House—the President will use more than half the amount in saving the 36 shiploads of food already available and will not have to await the shipment of other cargoes from this country.

Right in the shadows of the warehouses, bulging with their stores and the docks groaning under the weight of their fresh food supplies from America, tens of millions of men, women, and children who survived the war are to-day facing death or disease from starvation and their governments are facing demoralization before the mad onrush of the Bolshevik.

LARGE SHIPMENTS READY.

On this side 500,000,000 pounds of pork and pork products are ready for shipment; so much meat has piled up at many important Atlantic ports that an embargo has been necessary to prevent further congestion.

When word was flashed over the wires to the packing industry that England had failed to "come through" and make good on her orders, 50 representative meat packers from all parts of the country hurried to Washington for conferences with the Food Administration officials.

Last October they entered into a gentlemen's agreement with the Government to maintain a minimum price of 17½ cents a pound for hogs.

The farmers had been appealed to through every known medium to raise more hogs, both from patriotic and monetary motives.

WILL MAINTAIN PRICE.

In establishing a high price the Food Administration, the Department of Agriculture, and the packers offered a bonus to increase production. Now that the farmer has gone ahead with what amounted to a guaranty by the Government of an extra reward and raised more porkers than this country had ever before had, this Government is going to try to maintain the price.

The packers, through their official organ, the National Provisioner, say that "it has been suggested that it is to the financial advantage of Great Britain to allow matters to lag a trifle. As stocks pile up in this country the tendency will be toward a price break in order to avoid loss."

"It is a question of honor," they point out, "and it is believed that the British will 'come through' and make good on their orders."

When the packers agreed to maintain the 17½-cent minimum price for the month of January, it was with the understanding that there would be Government and foreign orders sufficient to make it possible for them to pay that price and still do business.

The foreign orders failed to develop when England announced she wanted no more American pork products, but would raise her own.

PACKERS SEE CRISIS.

The packers foresaw that unless Government assistance was forthcoming ruin stared them in the face; institutions in which they held securities would go down with them; small packers would be forced out of business; pork products would glut the market and would have to be sold at a loss; other meat products would automatically drop and a financial crisis would be on.

Minimum prices fixed by the Government were not binding, but under the circumstances the acceptance of them by the packers made them operative and almost as effective as if they had been binding. The same prices were also effective in all the allied nations, since they were based on a scheme through which the world's pork supply was jobbed.

The high Government official mentioned above, who, because of his position, asks that his name be withheld, holds that the present situation is brought about as a result of what he calls "the old-time selfish English commercialism."

SEES BRITISH COMPETITION.

He said that, in effect, it means that English commercialism is coming to the fore to repudiate a pledge of honor and to say to the United States, "We will not abide by your food rules—we will fix our own prices—we will reap our own profits—we will be your competitor."

"German commercialism wrecked Germany," the Government official declared. "It was selfish; it was rotten; it was too much for this age. It had the German people fooled.

"We are now having to deal with a brand of commercialism that is worse than Germany ever dreamed of; it is English commercialism. You may go back as far in her history as you like and you will find it.

"Mr. Hoover is having the very devil of a time over there trying to make England carry her end of the burden and play fair. We can only hope that she will come around shortly.

"There are now 36 shiploads of food supplies either already docked or about to be docked in European ports, but not a pound of them can be used to relieve the millions of starving people over there unless financial arrangements are made to satisfy the demands of the United States Treasury.

SAYS ENGLAND LAID DOWN.

"England has laid down on her agreement to take certain shipments of pork products. Much of the shipment in question is pork and pork products. It was sent over under the assumption that England would continue to make good her orders.

"These 36 shiploads of food represent $55,000,000. The President is familiar with the situation.

"It was this, among other things, that caused the President to be so insistent in getting an appropriation of $100,000,000 for immediate relief in the allied countries. The food is already over there. He needs the money to pay for it before it can be distributed."

At no time since America first cast her lot with the allies, the Government official declared, has coordination between England and America in regard to food been more urgent.

During the past year England has taken from this country double the amount of pork products of France and Italy combined.

If Serbia, Poland, Armenia, and some of the other weaker nations had some sort of organized government machinery with which to handle credits, much of the record-breaking pork supply of this country could be cared for, the official said.

WHITE SENSED GRAVITY.

Henry White, member of the American peace delegation, apparently sensed the gravity of the situation when he sent a cable message to Congress voicing the same sentiments expressed in the cable appeal of the President. Among other things Mr. White's message said:

"Aside from the stoppage of bolshevism, I understand there is in the United States considerable surplus of food accumulated at high prices, maintenance whereof guaranteed by our Government or assurance under its auspices, and it is necessary to dispose of this surplus in order to relieve warehouse and financial facilities as well as prevent serious fall in prices, with radical break in market, which would cost our country more than the appropriation asked for.

PACKERS IN WASHINGTON.

Under the caption, "Meat-export embargo disturbs the trade," the National Provisioner, official organ of the American Meat Packers' Association, carries the following article in its issue of January 11:

"Some 50 representative meat packers from all parts of the country having interest in export orders met with Food Administration officials in Washington on Wednesday of this week to discuss the congestion in the export situation caused by the stoppage of British shipments.

"When the packers agreed to a continuation of the 17½-cent minimum price on hogs for the month of January, it was with the understanding that there would be Government and foreign orders sufficient to make it possible for packers to pay the 17½-cent minimum price and still do business. Continuation of high live prices, asked as a means of satisfying the producers, was to be made possible by Government and allied support in the export market so as to make operations possible.

"The foreign orders promised for January have not developed, and meats packed on this expectation have piled up at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia awaiting shipping instructions until the congestion reached the point where the Railroad Administration declared an embargo on such shipments by rail to these ports.

"The situation became critical, and the packers' committee went to Washington to confer with the authorities. At the Wednesday conference, with about 50 packers present, Mr. Snyder, for the Food Administration, explained that his office had recently received word from the British food ministry in the United States to the effect that all orders for pork products for which Great Britain was responsible and which were scheduled for January shipping had been suspended.

SMALL VOLUME OF ORDERS.

"As a result there are definite orders on hand for January covering but 89,000,000 pounds of pork products, against which the packers are offering 500,000,000 pounds. In addition to the definite orders on hand the Food Administration believes that the foreign buyers will actually take during January enough more to bring the total up to 473,500,000 pounds.

"In commenting on the present situation Mr. Snyder said he firmly believed that the potential demand for our pork products in Europe was greatly in excess of the domestic supply.

"He stated that many of the foreign nations, especially the smaller nations, are in bad shape financially. This does not include Great Britain, France—which has a credit balance in this country—and Italy, which has a credit balance in that country.

"Holland's finances are satisfactory, but she has not yet satisfied the allies as to her intention to observe the regulations governing resales to enemy firms. Even now, in advance of the peace congress, the matter of an exchange of commodities with Germany is under discussion, potash probably being the material with which she will obtain food during the coming winter.

"Food Administration officials made no secret of their disturbance at the action of the British authorities. They have drafted a letter to the British food ministry in the United States, which will be cabled to London, and may ask Mr. Hoover to reenforce their action by cabling him the sense of this meeting.

SUGGEST PACKERS COMBINE.

"They have suggested that packers take joint action under the Webb bill, in manner similar to that recently taken by the textile industry. The wool and cotton men, acting together, have sent a man to Europe to act for them collectively.

"To complicate matters, the War Trade Board on Wednesday put on the free list four Scandinavian neutrals. This may tend to demoralize the market, and an effort will be made to have licenses so worded as to protect the market and the allotment packers who have been cooperating with the Government.

"Food Administration officials admitted that the packers as a whole had made less than the 9 per cent permitted them under the Government regulation of their profits; that there was available sufficient shipping space to handle the full amount of meat; and that while there was probably ample freezer space available, there would be even more as soon as beef commenced to move more rapidly.

"It has been suggested that it is to the financial advantage of Great Britain to allow matters to lag a trifle. As stocks pile up in this country the tendency will be toward a price break in order to avoid loss. It is a question of honor, however, and it is believed that the British will 'come through' and make good on their orders. It is believed that the next 10 days will see a change for the better in the situation, and that everything will be all right before the first of next month. Already slight relief has been given by allotment orders from the new European relief commission. The total is small, however.

"Packers who spoke on the subject stated that adequate relief must soon be given or they would be forced to greatly reduce killing. They mentioned the bad effect on export trade of the Atlantic seaboard tie-up, and asked that the Government be requested to hold out for giving American packers the advantage of freedom among neutrals of the right of resale.

"It was evident that all the packers were ready to 'go the limit' to help the Government and to keep their word on the hog-price matter, but that they also expected the Government to protect them to the extent of promises made, on the basis of which they had undertaken to operate."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, nobody on earth has any right to say that any part of this money is to be used to stabilize the market anywhere. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will yield for a question.

Mr. NEW. It is not a question, but I shall not intrude long on the time of the Senator. As I understand, the question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and in that connection the Senator from Virginia either read or caused to be read a statement by Mr. Hoover to the effect that the money to be expended for food supplies is to be spent in the United States, at least I so understood. Mr. President, that prompts the retort that that is only the word of the gentleman giving it and is bound by no legal obligation or anything of that sort; it may be set aside or broken in a moment. I do not mean to reflect on him. He no doubt intends to keep his word.

But if it is the purpose or wish of the Senate that that point should be safeguarded and that the money should be spent in the United States, it is very much better to trust to the substance of the law than to the shadow of a promise. I recall, as every other Senator here does, I presume, that in the early days of the bond issues we were told by the War Department and by the Treasury Department that every dollar that was raised from the early liberty loan was to be spent in the United States for munitions, ammunition, explosives, and articles of a similar kind. At the direction of the Treasury officials and the War Department officials I went out, as nearly every other Member of this body did, I presume, and said to the people to whom we were undertaking to sell those bonds that the money was to be spent in the United States. It is a matter of common knowledge that a great proportion of it has been spent abroad; that supplies were bought in England, France, and all the countries of Europe, except those with whom we were at war, to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. I have no doubt that it was the intention of the authorities at that time that that money should be spent in the United States, but it was not so spent; and there is no more reason why this guaranty now given by Mr. Hoover should hold good than there was that the guaranty given by the Treasury authorities and the War Department authorities in those days should hold good.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the extract which I read stated—I will read it again—

> Allies are willing and anxious to do all they can, and have and will contribute to the full extent of their resources, but it must be borne in mind that most of the food must be purchased in the United States, and American money would be used for such purchase and transportation.

Now, as to meat foodstuffs, I do not know of any place in the world where there is a surplus except in the United States. There are other places where wheat may be procured, but we have a large surplus of meat products.

Mr. PENROSE. Do I understand the Senator to accept my amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not; I have not indicated such a purpose, and I can not imagine why the Senator should conjure up in his imagination any such idea. I have not alluded to it.

Mr. PENROSE. I thought it was so closely in harmony with the persuasive utterances of Mr. Hoover that the Senator would cheerfully accept it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not accept it. The Senate can do with it as it sees fit. So far as I am personally concerned, I am unwilling to do an act of charity or benevolence in the attempt to save starving people from death, and accompany it with the statement that if we act at all we must make a profit out of the transaction. I say it would be unfortunate for the Senate of the United States to attach a profiteering condition to a donation to save starving people.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, one more word and I will not interrupt the Senator further. How does it make it a profiteering arrangement to require that wheat, which the Government is compelled to buy at $2.26 a bushel, shall be bought by this revolving fund if any wheat is needed to send to Europe?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They may be able to get it cheaper elsewhere; and I say it is profiteering when you fix an arbitrary price. I do not know whether it can be purchased any cheaper or not; I do not know whether they will come here for it or not; I hope they will. I believe this market affords the best opportunity for them not only to buy meat stuffs but breadstuffs.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. May I suggest that Mr. Glasgow testified that the grain corporation of the United States Government had 143,000,000 bushels of wheat on hand now?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I remember that; and I have stated that there was a very large amount of wheat in the elevators and granaries held and owned by the Government of the United States for which they paid $2.26 a bushel.

Mr. PENROSE. What objection is there to sending that wheat to these sufferers in Europe?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am very willing to have them come here and buy it, but I am not willing to say, "I will donate something to save you from starving, provided you will buy my wheat at prices greater than you can get it for from other people."

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator does not mean to express the idea that we are really going to be paid for these foodstuffs?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have not any doubt of it, with very slight exceptions. The amount appropriated is to be used as a revolving fund. Some little of it will be lost, used in charity, but for the great bulk of it we will have the obligations of foreign countries, and we will get the money back. The Senator, however, wants not only to get the money back, but he wants to be assured of getting a profit; he wants to do a profiteering business. I thought war profiteering was not in much favor among the people of this country, but the Senator is holding on to it with great tenacity, and he wants to donate money to relieve people from starvation, provided they will pay him a big profit.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator accept my amendment if I restrict it to those supplies for which the Government of the United States is not repaid?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think any such amendment as that ought to go in the bill. It might all be repaid; I do not know what part will be repaid, but we are assured that most of it will be repaid. There will be some little loss in charity—that is the information we have on the subject—but I think we ought to do it freely, generously, and voluntarily. If we are going to relieve these people from starvation, we should take the foodstuffs and hand them to them, and the governments under which they live can repay it if they desire to do so; but I am not willing to put them on terms to pay any particular price for any commodity which we are to sell.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to say at the outset that I have no sympathy whatever with the assaults that are now being made on Mr. Hoover. He may be a Republican, he may be a Democrat; I care very little about that. I think he is a citizen of the United States; and if he is, the United States may well be proud of him. But he is a citizen of humanity; he is a citizen of the world.

I expect to vote for this bill. I regard it as simply an act of charity. If we pass this bill it will be simply a ladling out of bounty and charity to distressed people.

The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who has just returned after a sojourn of some months in Europe, and who attended the sessions of the interallied council on finance, who handled the subject of foreign loans and rendered great service to this country and to the allies, said in his statement before the Committee on Appropriations:

> I consider that Bolshevism is like a boil on a diseased system. It indicates something wrong.

Mr. President, that is true. Bolshevism is a boil that should not be nourished but should be lanced. The so-called Lodge amendment to this bill has improved it immensely. I am opposed to feeding anything but hot lead to murderous Bolshevists, anarchists, and others who seek to destroy the civilization which has been built up on this earth after so many sacrifices and so much painful labor. I would not vote for this bill if I thought one dollar of the money appropriated by it would be spent among those brutal Germans who sank to the bottom of the ocean millions of tons of foodstuffs. Consider that the Bolshevists, so I am told on responsible authority, allowed 4,000,000 pounds of meat at one point to spoil because they were too lazy and indolent and trifling even to bring it in where it would not be contaminated and ruined. Talk to me about feeding Bolshevists that have not energy and nerve and industry enough to save the foodstuffs they already have!

With perfect respect to the eminent chairman of the committee who reported the bill, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], I think all this talk to the effect that we are going to get back every dollar of this appropriation is without foundation. In my judgment not a dollar of it will be paid back. It is a charity, a bounty, a gift. But better no charity, better no bounty given at all, than that given grudgingly. People do not appreciate that hospitality which is grudgingly extended

I repeat, while I am for the bill I am under no delusions in regard to it. There are no rainbows in my spectacles. I know that this is for charity; and as such, in view of the perilous position in which the world now is, I am inclined to favor the bill. But, Mr. President, while charity is a beautiful thing, while mercy is a beautiful thing, charity and mercy do not build governments nor make a people strong and great. It is justice that does that. It would not be justice, it would not even be real charity, to feed the peoples in the former German Empire. It would neither be justice nor charity to feed the Ottoman Turks; neither justice nor charity to feed any of those within the recent Austro-Hungarian Empire. Do you think I am going to vote a dollar of American money to feed a Bulgarian, who if he comes to our shores will come to destroy and not to enjoy our institutions?

While we are doing charity I am going to assist, in so far as my vote is concerned, on the main bill, and I shall vote for the bill even if my amendment is defeated. Let us also do justice, which is better than charity. Justice will build governments. Justice will sustain governments. Over in Europe now there are 1,800,000 American soldiers. How long they will be kept there, inscrutable fate can not tell. Even she does not know; but they are there. They should be brought home at once. The Army here is being demobilized; bring home our overseas troops. The young Americans who hurled back the Hunnish brute and rescued us from the sword of the Turk and from the infamy and the atrocity of the Bulgar and from the Magyar should have justice. So, Mr. President, while we are dipping our hands into the Treasury and ladling out charity to those who do not understand our institutions here, who do not understand civil liberty, let us do justice to those whose valor and energies have preserved civilization.

Here is an amendment which I am going to propose, and I hope it will be adopted, viz:

Add a new section, as follows:

> That every soldier, sailor, and marine in the Army and the Navy of the United States, upon receiving an honorable discharge, shall be entitled to keep and retain as his own property the uniform and overcoat and other articles of apparel he is wearing at the time of his discharge, and that no debit nor charge whatever against him shall be entered by reason of his so retaining such uniform, overcoat, and other apparel.

The next item will call for an expenditure of about $360,000,000. But are you going to pause in doing true justice; are you going to vote $100,000,000 for charity but nothing for justice? To resume:

> And there shall be paid to every soldier, sailor, and marine full pay for 90 days next ensuing after the date of his honorable discharge.

We would not have any charity to dispense; we would not have any Treasury from which to draw; we would not have any schools or churches; we would not have any ships or harbors, or temples of learning, or temples of religion, or homes, or aught else to make life worthy had it not been for the valor and the sacrifice of these American soldiers, who gave up the opportunities of civil life, who gave up their gainful occupations, and by their strength saved this Nation so that it might have food to dispense to other peoples.

It seems to me therefore that while mercy and charity are beautiful attributes, wonderful things, that go to help sustain a liberty-loving country, the main question is lost sight of. The soldiers who helped us, the soldiers who themselves preserved our liberties, who made it possible that we could be charitable, bountiful, and magnanimous to other nations, are being entirely overlooked, just as a Chinese gambler on the Pacific coast would overlook a "white chip," if you know what that means.

So I will ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

I had it in mind to offer an amendment providing for six months' pay to every soldier, but that would be too heavy a drain upon the Treasury at this particular time, although it would be nearer justice to the soldier.

Mr. President, that constitutes all that I have to say upon this subject. At the proper time I will offer the amendment; and I ask now that it may be printed for the discussion of the Members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Senator from Arizona offers an amendment which will be stated.

Mr. ASHURST. I just tender it, and ask that it may be printed, Mr. President. I will offer it later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer it as an amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I understand that I can not offer it now. I simply tender it, and ask that it may be printed; and at an early time I will offer the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, for the purpose of removing any uncertainty regarding the President's price-fixing order of February 21 of last year, let me read the concluding sentence of the order:

> The sums thus determined and fixed are guaranteed by the Government of the United States at the respective principal primary markets of the United States above mentioned to every producer of wheat of any grade so established under the United States grain-standards act, upon the condition that said wheat is harvested in the United States during the year 1918 and offered for sale before the 1st day of June, 1919, to such agent or employee of the United States, or other person, as may be hereafter designated, at any one of the above-mentioned cities, which are, for the purposes of this act, hereby declared to be the principal primary markets of the United States, and provided that such producer complies with all regulations which may be hereafter promulgated in regard to such guaranty by the President of the United States.

From which it will be seen that this guaranty applies to the crop of 1918 if it is marketed by the 1st day of June next, and to that only.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I direct the Senate's attention for a few minutes to a phase of this measure which I fear we are overlooking, or failing to contemplate, because of the many conflicting collateral questions which have been intruded upon the measure.

This bill has been explained with fullness by the able chairman of the Appropriations Committee. He does not need the aid of anyone; but in my opinion its passage, as well as its understanding, has been very much embarrassed by the viewpoint expressed by Senators, gathered from prejudices they entertain upon phases of government that are no part, as I see it, of this measure, and which I fear, unless we are cautious, will greatly embarrass the passage of the bill and tend to bring about a result that is not in the intention of any Senator here, by paying heed at this time to these collateral matters which I regard as foreign to the measure.

Let me be specific. Senators object to the measure upon the ground that it may be administered by Mr. Hoover, against whom certain Senators have a stated prejudice. Other Senators object to the bill because it will result in the purchase of supplies now held by packers; such is their apprehension; that may or may not be true. Other Senators object to the bill because they think that in some manner some of its benefits or benefactions may filtrate to those whom they do not wish to be the objects of our generosity. Each of these Senators conceives his particular objection as sufficient to cause him to oppose the bill.

Mr. President, this is a measure brought in here to feed the hungry. It is brought in to relieve distress. It is proposed upon the ground of another exhibition on the part of the United States of its generosity to the needy of the earth. We are either for that purpose or we are against it. We either wish to grant this bounty or we do not. If motives purely collateral, touching other subjects foreign to the measure, are to control us, then our decision in the final result is influenced by anything else and everything else than that which the bill is intended for, and our vote will be inscribed against ourselves when it in no wise has expressed our viewpoint or our conviction upon the merits of the measure itself.

Of course, to the sense of charity of any human being a hungry person appeals keenly; and when we see from the press reports that there are millions in distress and dying in the panic of starvation, amidst all the chill of coming winter and all the indescribable devastation that must be upon these people and yet to come, our sympathies are immediately aroused. We can say, with the observation in King Lear:

> Poor naked wretches, whereso'er you are,
> That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
> How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
> Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you
> From seasons such as these?

But, Mr. President, what I wish to impose upon the Senate, if I may, is this thought, that whether it is our charity which inclines us kindly to the support of the measure or personal objections to certain administrative features of our Government that shall induce us to oppose it, I beseech you to count the result; and here is where I impose upon your attention, I trust for a minute, and I ask your attention.

First, I ask the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President of the United States has requested this appropriation. He is on the ground. He must know why he asks it. He must know, my fellow Senators, some reason why he feels that this Government will be compensated in yielding to his request, either by compensation bodily, in the manner explained by the Senator from Virginia, or by compensation spiritually.

Now, Mr. President, suppose for all these collateral reasons you defeat this measure. I invite you to the thought that this is the first request made by the President of the United States since he sat at the peace conference for anything that he regarded as essential for harmonizing those frictions which are flashing through that conference. It is the first request that has been made for anything which in his judgment will bring about a concord of circumstances and contribute to the object you all have in view—a speedy peace and an early tranquillity of those nations.

Now, Senators, let us assume that the different objections presented by eminent Senators, sincere as they were, on different collateral phases of the bill shall prevail and that there shall be enough votes to defeat the measure—before the world how do you stand?

First, that the very first request made by the President, partaking of no partisan attitude—for that can always be understood abroad—is defeated, with all the discouragement that at once attends it and all the misconception and misconstruction that would follow it.

Second, Senators, you would have before the world the fact that it was the Senate—the United States Senate—which defeated the measure, after the House had passed it, and you would give license to those who have been misrepresenting the Senate in different parts of the world with the accusation that it was only biding its time to defeat anything the President of the United States should inaugurate in connection with the peace conference.

Thus a humane object, having no purpose whatever of a partisan nature, being advocated or opposed in no wise by Senators upon the basis of any partisan distinction, would be beaten upon these collateral issues, leaving the construction to follow that in this Senate, which was accused of opposing anything the President would undertake, in the very first request he makes he is defeated and discredited, when such was not your intention. If one of you has that intention, it is your privilege. You would have the right, if you felt justified in it; but in these different collateral matters that are being presented you are being allured to an object that I am sure is not within your views.

Now, Senators, a second phase of this matter, which will conclude the liberty I take with you.

The President of the United States must contemplate that by granting this measure we shall be able to feed those people who, in their hunger and in their distress, are in a condition of mind irresponsible for their own conduct. He must feel that the granting of this measure would compose these people and would bring about the harmony which you all desire.

Senators, should we defeat this measure, contemplate with me a thought I beg to suggest, as my own, of course. It may be at variance with yours.

Every one of the small nationalities which are in distress and hunger, as described by the eminent chairman when he opened the debate upon this bill, will be at once told that our defeat was to turn against them. They will see that the very first call of theirs was disobeyed, their very first need ignored. These people, remember, Senators, turned against the Government under which they were and at the command of the President of the United States revolted and sought to set up for themselves a government of liberty and freedom; and for that they starved. They became, at our command, revolting agencies against the imperial kings who were oppressing them. But, while oppressed in liberty, they still had a method of getting bread. Then the imperial masters will summon these to behold the spectacle that we invited them, under the cry of "Come unto Me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest," to hunger and starve them after we had brought them to the point of their distress where they could not aid themselves. Then, Senators, as I see it, in such a desperation they will turn upon the occasion, and the very first they will rend will be your soldiers—not in enmity against America but in opposition to the world of affairs.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Illinois really mean to tell the Senate that if they do not give this $100,000,000 to feed these people they will rise against the American soldiers?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois may sometimes be perplexing in his observations, but he is usually clear in his intentions. My observations were just the reverse of that. I did not say that if we did not give them the money they would rise against the American soldier. I said, to the contrary, that one of the very first things that they would rend would be the American soldier, not because they would desire to assail him but because, in their temper and distress, their opposition and their resentment would be against the world; and if the Senator will but be patient for a second while I conclude the sentence he will see exactly my full meaning. It is this: They will then turn, Mr. President, against every organization of government that is around them. They will become a part of the agencies of confusion and destruction. It will become necessary then for the American soldier to be called, together with other soldiers, to maintain order. He will be invoked to remain in his present position to accomplish this object. In doing that he is at once confronted by this crazed mob of human beings, whom he must seek to suppress or to compose, quite as our soldiers in Russia have been called to the very same kind of undertaking; and, not with an intention to injure him, behold our soldier detained in Europe for two more years or for one more year or for six more months—aye, indeed, for one more month—longer than necessary, and himself and his life hazarded because of these consequences which would follow from these now discouraged men in despair and hopelessness.

That, I answer the able Senator from Missouri, is the position I assert.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. REED. I am glad the Senator made the explanation he did, because, if I heard him correctly, he certainly did say that unless this food was furnished to these people they would be the first to rend the American soldier; but I think he ought to modify his second statement. The effect of his second statement is that unless these people get this money they are going to turn against all law and all government and become a sort of international banditti. If they are that kind of people, they are not worthy of our charity.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, while the Senator from Illinois thanks the Senator from Missouri for the suggestions that come from a source such as we know the Senator to be—able and thoughtful—nevertheless, he can not qualify his observation. I mean what I said, and I said what I mean. It is this—not, as the able and eminent Senator seems to construe, that such will be the result if we do not give them this money, for I made no such assertion; but I said if they were not fed and in their hunger and in their distress they lost the responsibility which men invariably lose when hungered and hopeless and in despair, they would then become a force against all organized society and every form of mankind; and among those who would first suffer from the effects of that, if this bill were beaten for other objects than the intention to do so—beaten because of these different collateral matters and collateral contentions which eminent Senators have urged against the measure—I do say, sir, it would mean, in the final end, that the soldiers of America would be kept there in Europe to help repress this disorder, to overcome this anarchy, and, sir, in order to accomplish the purposes of peace we would be keeping our own soldiers in Europe for a time far beyond our intentions and in the meantime jeopardizing their health, their comfort, and their lives. Therefore, Mr. President, I besought the eminent Senators to contemplate what would be the result of their action if they should defeat the bill because of these collateral objections; and the query of the eminent Senator from Missouri is a complete proof of the assertion I made and that he has contemplated that these things could arise from the defeat of the bill if he or other Senators for other reasons vote against the bill, not intending at the time that any such result should follow.

Mr. President, I have assumed to point out two things, and on those two things I rest the imposition the Senate has kindly allowed me to put upon it:

First, the effect upon the President of the United States and his undertaking there, should he be defeated, with no intention on your part to do so and no desire on your part to do so, the effect of the construction would weaken him in every other form of mediation, consideration, or deliberation which for the balance of the time would occupy him. No editorials of writers, no speeches from spokesmen, no asseverations from American patriots, however much they supported him, would be of any avail against the very first act on the very first request at his very first sitting at the peace conference.

I state the last, and then I conclude.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator is mistaken with regard to the date of this request. The President cabled the substance of his request while in Italy, I think, the day after his arrival in Rome. It was not a request either accompanying or resulting from the first meeting of the peace conference.

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator probably has been too busy, and I know how industrious he is, to recognize that the peace conference assembled on Saturday for the first time and is now in orderly procession; and if we defeat this now, known to be his first request to the Congress, it would be that the defeat comes to him as the very first act on the part of the United States Senate or the Congress—the Senate, I must insist, the House having passed the bill—as the very first act after he sits in the deliberations of the conference.

Mr. THOMAS. But it was merely a repetition of a request he previously made. It was transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], by the President the day after his arrival in Rome.

Mr. LEWIS. That may be, but may I call my able friend's attention that in the last few days the President has sent cables and members of the American Commission have sent cables and now Mr. Hoover sends cables, and they ask and request all of you, and they are now sitting watching you with their eyes to see what will be done with it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from Illinois know whether this purpose of the President is a part of the plan emanating from the peace conference? Does he know whether other States have decided to participate in this arrangement, or is it to be an exclusively American function?

Mr. LEWIS. I am compelled to answer the Senator by saying there has been read here by the chairman and also the report discloses that this is a cooperation. The measure here, I will say to the able Senator from Michigan, is a mere contribution on our part in cooperation with the other nations, and they have designated that they will not only contribute but this morning evidence comes to us of the relative amounts. Therefore I say to the Senator that I deduce from that that this is a demand of the peace conference, or those who sit around the peace conference, for the purpose of feeding the hungry to compose their differences in order to facilitate the ultimate peace we all hope for. Such is my deduction, such is my belief, and it is because of such I assume to present to the Senate my views.

Now, Mr. President, because of this may I beseech able Senators to contemplate the effect of their action upon the final results if they should not yield, and, even conceding the objections they urge to be well founded, that they should be urged at some other place than at this particular time; and I invite them, though the position be well taken, it is better for a little wrong that we might do a great good.

This measure, sir, I tender is for American humanity, for American peace, for the preservation of American interests as well, sir, as for European charity.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I expect to vote for this legislation, and I wish as briefly as I can to state my reasons for so doing.

First and foremost, I want to read as a part of my remarks a telegram from the President of the United States, which appeared in the RECORD last Saturday, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MARTIN] and the chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SHERLEY]. I do this for the reason it appears to me that the President feels that it is almost necessary to have this appropriation go through. I read:

PARIS, January 11, 1919.

TUMULTY.

The White House, Washington:

Please convey following confidential message to Senator MARTIN and Congressman SWAGAR SHERLEY:

"I can not too earnestly or solemnly urge upon the Congress the appropriation for which Mr. Hoover has asked for the administration of food relief. Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solution of peace. Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, has overwhelmed Poland, and is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food, and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance. The money will not be spent for food for Germany itself, because Germany can buy its food, but it will be spent for financing the movement of food to our real friends in Poland and to the people of the liberated units of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and to our associates in the Balkans. I beg that you will present this matter with all possible urgency and force to the Congress. I do not see how we can find definite powers with whom to conclude peace unless this means of stemming the tide of anarchism be employed."

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. President, this cablegram is the basis of my reasons for supporting this measure. I do not know what the conditions are in Europe, nor do I think anyone here knows. Perhaps the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations are the best posted, but I do know that we have a commission selected and in attendance at the peace conference at Versailles, now in session, and that the President of the United States is at that conference. I further know that the President and each member of the commission representing the United States ought to be in a position to give us information upon which we could act. I do not believe there is a man in this body who would stand up and say that the President of the United States would cable that this appropriation of $100,000,000 for the purpose as stated is vital and necessary, and in his opinion the only way in which peace could be brought about, unless he really thought so. This being true, tell us, then, what we could do except to support this legislation.

Mr. President, there is another phase to this question, and that concerns the condition of our country to-day, with Bolshevism overrunning Europe, which the President in his cablegram Saturday tells us is true. We know conditions in this country now are not such as we would like to see. We will soon have among us many idle men. We have now, according to the best authorities, 350,000 idle men in 19 cities. There is an organization in the State of New York which tells us there are 100,000 uniformed men now out of employment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. If we have three hundred and some odd thousand unemployed men in this country had we better not give them a little bread and a little money before we send this to Europe? [Applause in one of the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will remove the person from the gallery who made the demonstration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me, I think, Mr. President, that is a very thoughtless expression. I thought I saw the man who did it. I think he had on him the uniform of his country. I do not believe that he intended to offend the Senate. I hope the Chair will extend that leniency for which he is noted and not remove the offender for the first offense.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I trust he will, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been considerable noise in the galleries, disturbing Senators who were attempting to speak.

Mr. LEWIS. May I invite your attention, sir, that possibly the occupants of the Senate galleries have not been advised lately that our rules forbid applause, while permitted in the House? Perhaps the spectator may have misunderstood and assumed that the same privilege prevails here as in the House. If the Presiding Officer will be so kind as to suggest to him our rules, I think we will not have another violation of them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I merely wish to correct the statement of the Senator from Illinois. The House rules do not permit applause.

Mr. LEWIS. When I was a Member of the House I never knew any rule which prevented it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The House rule applies with reference to the occupants of the galleries, but they have no control over their own Members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In view of the fact that the Senate is considering a matter which appeals to the charity not only of Senators but of the world, and in view of the appeal made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, the Chair will exhibit the same charity, and request the Sergeant at Arms to instruct the offender not to repeat the offense upon the penalty of being removed from the gallery. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand from the Senator there are several hundred thousand unemployed people in some of our large cities. Does the Senator know whether there is a demand in those cities for labor?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I predicate my question upon what I have seen in all of the papers of New York, Washington, and every other city. You will find 20 applications for persons to be employed where you will find one who asks for employment. It may be true that there is a lack of employment, but I think the Senator will find the lack of employment grows out of the fact that wages are now so enormously high that no business can afford to pay the prices. If these men will go back to work at reasonable prices, they will find that there is plenty of employment in the United States.

In my own State, and undoubtedly in the Senator's State, the same is true, because they are adjoining States, we are making application every day to get young men discharged from the Army—men with families at home who can not hire help anywhere and who have nobody to take care of their stock except the women and little children. I think if we would discharge a great many of those people from the Army there would be employment very quickly for them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that there is necessity for labor in some agricultural States of the West and no one there to take up the work which we have is true. But, Mr. President, that does not meet the situation which now exists in some of the cities. People who are congregated and congested in the great centers of population can not get to those places and they can not perform the services that are there desired in the far West.

But what I call particular attention to is that the Senator says "if these men will go back to work at a reasonable wage." What is a reasonable wage in view of the prices of products in this country now? I do not myself know how what was called a reasonable wage prior to the war would furnish a basis for the existence of a man upon present prices. I do not know how he would keep his children clothed and his family fed upon what was called a reasonable wage at that time.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, I think he is falling into the error that every time the increased cost of labor sends up the price of the product of that labor you must then increase the price of labor again to meet the increased product of his labor, and when that goes up higher you must increase the price of the labor again to meet the higher cost of living, because as a matter of fact while before the war, taking ordinary products, the labor and the raw material were about 50-50, there are now in most cases more than 85 per cent representing labor, which shows that the raw material has not gone up anywhere to the extent that labor has. Therefore labor has added very much more than any other thing to the present cost of living.

Out in my own State we raise sheep. We were unable to get men to take care of them for five and six dollars a day at any place during the fall of the year. The Senator knows that. He knows the conditions in his own State. In our own State there is a big demand for labor. I was talking with a manufacturer of cars the other day. In one of the great cities where there has been a surplus of labor he informed me he would probably have to shut down in a short time, simply because the price of labor was so high he could not continue the business. When you come to paying $6, $7, $8, or $10 a day for the most ordinary labor the business of the country will not stand it. They can not go on at that rate. The present prices of products are so immensely high that in a short time you can not go on with your business. If a brick is to cost 10 cents you can probably build, but if your labor is so high that the brick costs a dollar you can not build.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the logic of the Senator, reduced to a simple proposition it is that the high prices with which the world is now cursed are due to labor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I said the labor price had increased enormously beyond the increase of raw material in the proportion of the cost of the finished product, and that fact the statistics show.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will agree that with the proposition the labor must at this time have a wage commensurate with and upon the basis of the high cost of living.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but if you send the cost of living through labor so enormously high that you immediately paralyze business you are bound to have in the end a reduction in the price of labor, because there will be no business to employ labor, and that is what we are suffering from to-day more than anything else. We are suffering from the fact that with the present prices of labor in our cities a great many businesses can not run and produce as they did before the war.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not, at the same price.

Mr. McCUMBER. They can not afford it.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator does not expect labor prices to go back under present condition to labor prices before the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not. I expect them all to conform to a new condition. I do not expect ordinary labor to hold up to $6 and $8 and $10 a day when the business of the country can not stand it. I think they will reach an adjustment in time, but the point I want to make is that there is employment for those who want to really get employment in the country at living wages.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, answering first the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], who has now left the Chamber, I believe the Government is making all possible arrangements to take care of the hungry and needy in our own country, if such conditions are found to exist. There was an amendment introduced in the Senate to-day by Senator ASHURST, of Arizona, providing for three months' pay for all discharged soldiers, which, I think, will become a part of this bill; if not, it will become a law before this Congress adjourns. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has stated the real situation in the western part of the country. In the Senator's State and in my own State of South Dakota there is now and has been a shortage of labor all the time. It is impossible for the farmers to pay the prices which have been asked without losing money by the proposition, but they have been compelled to do it.

With regard to the statements which I made, I saw it published in one of the daily papers here in Washington a day or two ago as coming from the secretary of a labor organization, it only applied, as I said, to 19 cities. The statement was that 350,000 men were out of employment in the United States in the 19 cities.

The purpose which I have, or one of the purposes in voting for this resolution, is to stop bolshevism in Europe, because as it spreads there it will come here, and we know, and every other man knows, that want and hunger, as we understand the terms, make a criminal out of any man. This is the phase of the subject to which I allude. It would make a criminal out of any Senator in this body if it became necessary for the protection of his life and the lives of the members of his family that he do acts along criminal lines. The passage of this legislation, as I see it, will go a long way toward the prevention of the deplorable conditions now existing in the greater part of Europe to-day, and indirectly it will be a great benefit to the United States, for the reason that bolshevism in Europe, unless checked, will spread all over the world. Mr. President, stranger things have happened than that Europe might ultimately be destroyed by this class of people.

Again, Mr. President, this item of $100,000,000 is an immense sum of money to me, but it would be a small thing to the country if you compare it with the possibility of another war. This sum would just about carry on the war for three days in the same proportion that it cost the country in the present war during the past year.

Permit me to say this, and then I will conclude my remarks. I believe the United States owes a great moral obligation to all her allies. We should stay by them until this war is actually ended and this great peril to the safety of the world is stamped out. How can any man reason that the war has actually ended when we are fighting in Russia the very armies which were created by the Kaiser of Germany and commanded by German officers now? We are fighting the same forces there to-day. The war has not ended and can not end as long as our boys remain in Russia to accomplish the purpose for which they are sent. The passage of this measure will give them encouragement. It is not a question of going into Russia. We are already there. Do not you think we owe the people of Russia a great debt? From the best information we can gather their losses are nearly 10,000,000 men in the war for freedom. It seems to me that we with our allies should stand together and assist these unfortunate people until they can establish a government of their own, which will be looked upon by the civilized nations of the world as a government which can be recognized.

The whole of southern Europe, the Balkan States, Poland, and the various Slavic States are a part or should be a part of the liberated people which this legislation is proposed to benefit. I do not believe this appropriation will be a gift or donation, as has been expressed on the floor. We have two or three Governments of these liberated people already in existence, and I believe they will repay to the Government of the United States their proportion of this money, as far as they can, and I have no doubt that all will eventually do so.

I think it is our duty, just as it was our duty to send troops into these countries to help liberate the world, to keep at least our moral and monetary influence there and help them establish the governments which we encouraged them to hope for in the democracy of the world. I have voted for and willingly given my support to all war measures since we have been in the war. I have cast votes which if a man had asked me two years ago to cast I would have thought him crazy, but I have "followed the flag"; I have voted for each and every war measure presented to the Senate thought necessary by the War Department.

I am confident if we show good faith toward our allies we should continue to give our moral support to each of them and extend financial credit as far as we can until the treaties of peace are signed and governments are established of recognized stability.

The prompt passage of this legislation by the Senate will show the people of Europe that we are willing to do our share in bringing to a final and successful conclusion the principles for which we have fought. Nothing less than this would show good faith. Nothing less would be our duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. One difficulty, I find, Mr. President, in supporting the measure unless it shall be very materially amended is the obligation which it imposes upon us in addition to those known to be necessary to assume between now and the end of the next fiscal year. In April, we are informed, a bond issue will again be offered of $6,000,000,000. I learn from a communication from a Cabinet officer that we will be expected to contribute $1,500,000,000 to a fund to establish credits for the allies in this country.

Under the existing law—

This Cabinet member says—

credit must be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, only for the purpose of national security and defense and the prosecution of the war in favor of the Governments engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, and the authority to establish such credit ceases upon the termination of the war.

He asks, therefore, for additional legislation which shall authorize the establishment of $1,500,000,000 of credit to enable the allies to purchase material and readjust their conditions by having access to that material not only in our own market, but to transport it when manufactured abroad for the purpose of building up their own industrial affairs.

This would make, if it were followed, a draft upon our financial resources of $7,500,000,000. With the $100,000,000 provided in this appropriation, it would increase it to $7,600,000,000. These, however, are only merely somewhat large drops in the bucket. Our annual appropriations will exceed that many times. Our tax levies will be required to meet all these appropriations, just how much no one is able to accurately compute at this time.

In addition to these obligations, we have our own burdens to carry. There are enormous private charities in this country administered by the Red Cross, by the Young Men's Christian Association, and by other organizations for the relief of various nationalities of the devastated countries. Every Senator in this Chamber knows how heavy those demands are upon his private resources. Scarcely a mail is delivered at the office of any Senator which does not bring one or more requests for help to some of our domestic charities, all of which are of a very meritorious character.

This $100,000,000 will be administered by the head of the Food Administration now abroad. With great respect to Mr. Hoover, I do not believe that he understands very well the difficulties of production. His problem has been that of the distribution for many years, beginning with 1914 or 1915. His efforts have been confined to relieving worthy objects of charity or of help from national appropriations or private funds out of the supplies furnished him.

Mr. Hoover is not a factor in the production of any of the supplies. He asked for the $100,000,000 through the voice of our absent Executive. The $100,000,000 will come out of the Public Treasury. It will be provided in the form of credits to be taken abroad. If the bill should be enacted into law the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] ought to be adopted, because it will tend to support our own market, not necessarily to keep up prices—that has been attended to by governmental authorities in other channels—but at least it will give some relief to our own market. Without this amendment there will be no limitation upon where this fund shall be expended. It may be all or part of it expended in South America for food, grains, and meat. I understand it is to be pooled with something like $300,000,000 in the hands of the allied nations. Possibly some of this fund, or a considerable part of it, might be spent in Australia to relieve the wheat market in that country.

That leads me to remark that we are now beginning to harvest what we sowed. We undertook to interfere with the natural laws of the market several years ago.

We undertook to fix prices by Government action. In some instances it was done by an act of Congress; in others by the interferences of various boards and bureaus, by their acts regulating the activities of what ordinarily is private business. At any rate, the Government now finds itself in a position where it is likely to be called on to maintain the prices it has fixed or to meet the contracts which it is at least morally bound to keep with the producers.

This is unofficial; I do not know whether any department would verify it or not; but I state that it is a market condition that imports of wheat into this country have been denied at the Pacific coast ports. No wheat can be brought into this market from Australia. I doubt whether imports of wheat can be brought into our markets from South America. This is for the evident purpose of keeping the price of wheat in the United States market at its present figure. The Government, having undertaken to guarantee prices, suddenly finds, with the end of the war, with a very large production of wheat in the United States, with fair crops abroad in such areas as are not under the control of military forces, that we are likely to have in world markets a reduction of present wheat prices. In order to prevent this decrease in the wheat prices, and consequent losses, the United States, if it has not actually prohibited as a war measure, at least is discouraging the importation of wheat from both Australia and South America. My information is that cargoes have been denied admission in the event they should be brought from Australia to the Pacific coast ports. This is for the purpose of supporting the market; it is that wheat prices may remain as they are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair) rapped with his gavel.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I shall not follow the practice of my colleague to cease talking when others are at the same time talking in the Chamber, because it is a matter of indifference to the Senator occupying the floor at this time. It does not disturb me at all. If it be agreeable to other Senators, I am very glad that all of us may be busy at the same time. So if others desire to carry on conversation, so far as the junior Senator from Illinois is involved in it, the Chair need not call such Senators to order unless he feels that it is due to the dignity of the Chair or of this Chamber so to do.

The object of preventing imports of wheat is to support the price of wheat on the market, as I have suggested, Mr. President.

I am told further—and these matters of information I get from dealers in both flour and wheat at various points in the United States—for instance, in New York it is reported that the flour market is overstocked; that prices ordinarily would fall; that they would fall for the same reason that wheat prices would fall, but the Government is controlling the distribution of flour just as it controls the distribution of wheat, and is keeping up prices to millions of consumers. With matters in that condition neither wheat nor flour will be permitted to decrease in price; and if the Government can keep the wheat price up, it will do so as long as the Government itself is liable for the $2.26 a bushel. It is rather a novel way for a purchaser who is "long" on the market to protect himself by keeping everything else out of the market, so that the price shall remain at the purchase figures or at a higher figure until he unloads.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator from Illinois think that it would be of more benefit to all the American people if the Government bought the crop of wheat for 1919 at the guaranteed price, which has already been made, and sold it in the market at the price in the general markets of the world, so that the American people would have the benefit of the same market that the people of other countries have? The guaranteed price was, I understand, made because of the small crop of 1916 to induce the largest possible production of wheat in order to carry on the war and feed the armies and nations of Europe in order to sustain our cause.

The President, under his power, fixed the price of wheat last September for 1919. Now that the war has closed and the Government has got to carry out the guaranty, would it not be better to buy the wheat and sell it in the market so that all the people may have the benefit?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would, Mr. President. I will say, in response to the Senator's inquiry, that I think the better way is for the Government to act as a private person who has overbought on the market would act if he has the means, and the Government has. He either must do that in private business or he must become bankrupt. The better way is to settle, if the Government has the money, and assuming now that it will be provided, the satisfactory way would be for the Government to go out in the market for the 1,017,000,000 bushels of wheat, which is the estimated crop, buy that, pay for it out of the Treasury, and then sell it for the best market price that can be obtained.

Mr. KELLOGG. In order to do that, I presume we shall have to have some legislation of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; undoubtedly that would be required.

Mr. KELLOGG. And we should have that because that crop will begin to be marketed in July of the present year. I think that is the best course to pursue, but I do not think we ought to compel the people of this country—all the people, those who are able and those who are not able—to pay the war prices simply because the Government made the guaranty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in accord with the Senator from Minnesota on that question; but the policy of the Government, manifested through the bureaus having authority, seems to be to the contrary. Their purposes seem to be to keep both wheat and wheat products at a figure that will protect the Government from loss. When the Government adopts a policy and carries it out, until the future wheat crop of 1919 is disposed of it must necessarily be at the cost of the consumer of the product, and higher prices.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am loath again to interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLOGG. So far as this year's crop is concerned, which will be marketed under the Government guaranty, some legislation will be necessary in order to authorize the Food Commission to sell it at the market price and take the loss. That legislation, it seems to me, the Food Administration must have, and I take it that the present plan of selling at a price based upon the Government guaranteed price must be changed by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of that. Congress must accept its share of the responsibility.

I remember when Senators voted here, it was argued that there ought to be a guaranty on wheat prices in order to stimulate production. The argument was adopted, "It is an artificial stimulus, it is true; but the conditions are artificial." The war conditions being abnormal, as they were, Congress deemed itself justified in making that guaranteed price. That is illustrative of the finite wisdom of mankind. Before we get through we shall have more of that, but this illustrates, so far as we have traveled, the utter unreliability of human judgment when men begin to interfere with markets. The Senate, the House, and the executive department undertook to perform a task that the business men—the producers and the distributors of a hundred million people—were carrying. We shouldered that burden. I think it was a shortsighted policy. I voted for some of it. It was a war policy, and I am willing now to vote for appropriations to buy the wheat or to change the price and to pocket the loss. We had better do that than to keep up the price of wheat and its resulting products in the Atlantic seaboard towns or to millions of private consumers. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] on the course to be followed by Congress.

All these cities must live between now and next spring. The food-producing centers can take care of themselves. There is no immediate danger of starvation there. Private charity will take care of Chicago; St. Louis will take care of herself and will feed her suffering poor; so will every other western city in the great producing areas of this country. It is other parts of the United States to which our attention must be directed; it is other parts of the world where the necessary food supplies must be had.

We now reach the point where we have not only the present crop, but the future crop must be taken care of. Additional legislation will be required for the Food Administration to meet the emergency. As a help toward mitigating that emergency and its rigors, the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to this bill has been prepared and submitted. It will to some degree help solve the problem in the proportion that $100,000,000 bears in its relation to the whole number of hundreds of millions of dollars required to handle the grain crop from the producer until it reaches the consumer.

Before we finish this problem, Mr. President, we will be made painfully aware of an elementary fact in all perishable production, to which wheat belongs and to which most foodstuffs belong, in that there is a recognized limit in preserving it. From the time that a bushel of wheat is a potential article of merchandise in the field by being placed in the soil by the farmer until it finally passes into the kitchen of the consumer or into a loaf of bread or some of its by-products, somebody must own the crop.

There is no derelict in food; it is not floating around on the market subject to any taker that comes along. Every bushel of wheat, from the time the seed is put into the ground until it passes into the human system as food, must be owned by somebody. In the beginning a vast number of farmers in this country—wheat raisers—own it. They keep what they need for their own uses. Their surplus passes into the hands of others. The grain movement is very well known. In the earlier part of the thrashing season a certain portion of it moves into the market almost from the machine; another portion of it goes to the producers' bins, and stays there, they selling it as their needs require or in response to the favorable figure that attracts it out of the bin into the general market. However, when it leaves the producers' hands it must pass into the hands of the purchaser at the elevator, whether it be a large or a small elevator. Somebody must carry it; somebody must own it. The Government undertook to own the wheat crop of the United States and relieve the general purchasing public of that problem. It ran a corner for the supposed public good. Now, we must keep the Government's promise or we must do what the Government can always do, refuse to meet its obligation, and that is not to be tolerated for a moment.

We understand now who takes the loss. This loss, which eventually must come out of the Treasury, in ordinary times, Mr. President, is distributed among hundreds and thousands of people. It is distributed amongst the farmers, amongst the grain buyers, the elevator men, the millers, and everybody who acts as an intermediary between the producer and the consumer. When it is distributed amongst millions of people only a comparatively few are bankrupted; the rest of them pocket their losses, which are of such a character that they can afford to lose, although in the aggregate the amount runs into an immense sum of money. In this instance, however, a single purchaser last September undertook to take the entire wheat crop—that is what it amounted to—and guaranteed a price of $2.26 a bushel, and when it did so it visualized on the market the problem of owning the wheat until it passes from the producer into the ordinary channels of consumption. These private intermediary holders, in normal times most of whom are looked upon with a hostile eye, the grain exchanges of the country, the great elevator systems at the terminal markets, most of whom are under fire nearly all of their lives and always are the subject of invidious criticism—these institutions, the elevators, the millmen, with their elevators, those who act as distributors, are the ones who carry the risk and own the wheat crop from the time it leaves the farmer or the producer until it passes to the consumers of the country.

The Government has legislated against grain exchanges. It has taxed them to death; it has made burdensome the transfer of property; it has taxed sales; it has laid its hand upon transactions for future delivery, almost stigmatizing them, per se, as gambling; and in various ways it has manifested its displeasure with those who handle the wheat crop, who own it in the intermediary stage between the producer and the consumer and themselves carry the risk. The Government and the people are now having visualized to them the problem, divided, it is true, among many hands, of carrying the wheat crop and the incidental risk of the ownership of that wheat crop. Future sales have been taxed almost out of existence; future deliveries have been regarded as little short of gambling in all of the foodstuffs under consideration—wheat and its by-products, rye, barley, and meats of every description—yet, Mr. President, the committee on cotton distribution of the War Industries Board sent the following telegram on December 9, 1918, to the presidents of the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges—I read from the Official Bulletin of December 12, 1918:

Please read from the rostrum of your exchange before the opening Monday morning, post on the bulletin board, and send to each member firm carrying contracts the following notice:

"The prohibition of foreign and speculative short selling of contracts on the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges ordered by the committee on cotton distribution on November 13 was an emergency measure.

"The conditions that existed following the signing of the armistice have been relieved and the emergency has passed.

"Our Government having made trade agreements with neutral nations, the export of cotton to all but enemy countries is now assured.

"Available tonnage in sufficient quantity to allow of exports fully 50 per cent in excess of last season's shipments is more than probable.

"The requirements of spinners and manufacturers can now be bought and moved without war-time restrictions.

"Confidence is restored, and under the circumstances the restrictions placed on the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges on November 13 are hereby removed."

What restrictions? Restrictions on short selling. What is "short selling"? It is selling something that you do not have at the present time, but which you have confidence that you can get in the market at a price that will be fairly remunerative to you, and you are willing to take the risk. That is allowed in the case of cotton, but short selling in wheat is stigmatized as a crime. My constituents in Chicago can not so go on the board of trade without practically laying themselves open to prosecution.

It is the fact, Mr. President, that we have not taken a sane view of actual business operations on the market that has led to the toils in which we now find ourselves; and before we finish we will discover that if the Government undertakes to preserve an artificial price level for wheat and wheat products it will draw from the pockets of the consumers all of the difference between the artificial level and the normal market price that does prevail or will prevail in other markets. There is no escape from that; and, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] stated awhile ago, it will be at the expense of those who can ill afford to pay it if the Government continues keeping up the price and making consumers stand it.

I have from a broker in Chicago a report on wheat and flour conditions in New York City. A large surplus exists there, but the Government keeps its finger on the dealer, and refuses to permit sales to be made. There is the grain corporation of which Julius Barnes is the head—a very competent man in the wheat market—which practically is the great purchaser and controller of wheat and wheat products in the United States, both for the domestic and for export trade. We can have no lowering of wheat prices so long as the Government interferes. Flour must remain at its present prices, wheat must remain at its present prices, until the Government takes its hand off the market and permits the natural laws of trade once more to resume their operation.

Mr. President, this $100,000,000 will be placed in hands outside of those of the President. Many other things have been placed in the hands of the President. I have no doubt that the very capable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia], who has supported this measure and explained its provisions with great lucidity, has the utmost faith in the capacity of the President to choose agents who will properly spend this money. I have that faith to a more limited degree. I am reminded that the President can not attend to all of these matters himself; that is beyond the capacity of any human mind; so he chooses agents for the expenditure. He will choose Mr. Hoover in Europe, and has done so, and probably Mr. Hoover will select his own help.

The President did so in the matter of aeroplane construction, the appropriations of $640,000,000 for which have never yet been satisfactorily accounted for. Mr. Hughes, in his report, recommended the court-martial of certain gentlemen, and the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, without passing upon the merely civil liability, found many things that were not in accord with good business. The President recommended in advance that such of them as by Mr. Hughes's report were found subject to court-martial be exonerated, and the War Department very recently, in a publication in the Official Bulletin, made the same recommendation, and a number of pages are occupied with reasons why these aeroplane officials should be released from all liability. I do not hold the President directly responsible for this miscarriage of justice. I do hold him responsible, however, for the agents whom he selected and who made such a thing possible. In this instance he has selected Mr. Hoover. Whom Mr. Hoover will select to spend the money in Europe I do not know.

Say that $300,000,000 will be furnished by the allied nations, making a joint fund of $400,000,000. In all human probability, the allies will have the major influence in the distribution of that fund. Are we at war with Russia? Notwithstanding that we have forces about the Arctic Circle, on the Murman coast, and about Archangel, we are told that we are not at war with that nation. We are not at war with Russia technically; but in fact the military status is that of war, and there is no escape from that conclusion.

We are at war with the Bolshevist government of Russia, if it can be dignified by the name of a government; however, technically we are at peace. I remember that only last winter, not yet a year ago, the President sent his telegram of congratulations to the Soviet congress in Russia. Who are they? Mr. Trotsky, Mr. Lenine, and the military authorities whom they had brought out of various places where they had been in hiding for some time to take charge of the Bolshevist army. There never was such a ragged, tatterdemalion crew seen in all history from the time when Walter the Penniless led the forerunners of the crusaders centuries ago. It is a criminal movement. The I. W. W's in this country are mere suckling babes in destruction, disorder, and bloodshed compared with this government in Russia.

Technically we are at peace. We are told that they are starving. I have no doubt of it. Who is to blame? Some say the Czar. Some say the German. Some say the Bolshevist. It is enough to know that there is no food there. Production has ceased. When industrial concerns were taken by the Bolshevist government all the skilled workmen that had any brains were marked for slaughter. A Bolshevist decree took all land in Russia from its owners and gave it to the ignorant idle and the agitator. They were to produce food. They never work. The result is famine. Everybody that knew anything of the science of government was on the proscribed list. Every banker that had a dollar was a public enemy. Every man that had any sense and preached any restraint upon human passions became a victim. With such a government, which placed a premium upon the most unholy of human passions, an organized band of criminals, the peasants of Russia remaining on land had ceased to raise food in every place where they could be reached by this criminal element from the larger cities of this unhappy country. As soon as animals were produced to the food stage or crops were coming out of the ground or truck gardens had any human food in sight, it was taken from them. If any worthless money was offered, if they refused to take it, a bludgeon and dagger was legal tender in all Russia, and is yet.

Is it any wonder that the peasants of Russia have ceased to produce, that their flocks are scattered, that their food granaries, that their great cattle ranges that were left in the Ukraine country and in Siberia have passed into hands where the Bolshevist government can not go? All of the country subject to their jurisdiction is a vast wilderness, weltering in the blood of the victims that might raise food and produce supplies to support the people.

What are we to do? Feed the disturbers and their dupes by loading the American taxpayer with this $100,000,000. Keep up the price in New York and in Chicago. We will not starve out in the country. We will take care of our poor in the townships and in the villages and in the cities up to 100,000; and in the larger cities in the food-producing area—Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, and elsewhere—we will take care of the poor there. There may be some shortage of supplies, but they will go through until next spring, and there will be no starvation in that country. But in the other areas, where there is not enough produced to feed the people, you must draw upon those supplies. Every ton of food sent out of our own country into Russia spells suffering for the children and the women in the Atlantic coast cities and elsewhere where the food production is not sufficient to supply the population of that country. That is what it means. There is no escape from it.

Mr. Hoover will have charge of the fund. We are not at war with Russia. Technically they will be entitled to a share. We have a small force in northern Russia, not enough to preserve peace in the affected areas where starvation is threatening. The only way to keep any part of the $100,000,000 away from the Bolshevist vermin is to have on hand enough of the army and navy of the allies and this country to distribute it to the worthy at the point of a bayonet. Otherwise the deluded followers of the admitted self-constituted vermin and vagabonds that constitute that Government will seize the supplies we send to that country and appropriate them to their own use and let the bourgeoise starve. Every Bolshevist is an able consumer. It is as a producer he lags in the human procession. He will be present when food is visible.

His, Mr. Trotsky says, is "the government of the proletariat." "The proletariat" means every vagabond and criminal and tramp and worthless idler who has infested Russia for the last 25 years who has the breath of life in him to-day. We have no guarantee here that part of this $100,000,000 will not be used for that noble band of ultimate consumers.

Here is Mr. Hoover's statement, of date January 7, 1919:

> Our reports show specifically—

Speaking of the need of food supplies to be purchased by the hundred million dollars—

> Finland, that food is practically exhausted in cities; that while many of the peasants have some bread, other sections are mixing large amount of straw. They are exhausted of fats, meats, sugar, and need help to prevent a renewed rise of Bolshevism.

No mortal in this Chamber knows the actual conditions in Finland. The department is somewhat limited in its information vouchsafed to us. Portions of Finland are in control of the Bolshevists. The allies or United States military and naval forces do not control the distribution of food in that territory, except in certain limited places, I believe.

Mr. Hoover continues in another paragraph:

> Baltic States, food may last one or two months on much reduced scale. They sent deputation to our minister in Stockholm imploring food.

Here, at least, are two areas within Russia that Mr. Hoover specifically proposes to make the beneficiaries of a part of the $100,000,000 fund. How much farther he will extend it no one can say; but if supplies be sent to Petrograd, or to some of the interior Russian cities that are in control of the Bolshevists, when we have once passed the bill in its present form we are without remedy. Part of our proceeds go into their hands. If the Bolshevists take it by force of arms and keep it from reaching the worthy objects of charity in that country, there is no relief. An amendment at least ought to be adopted that will prevent its going to any point in Russia where the military forces of the allies and the United States will not control absolutely the disposition of the relief.

The Government now is engaged—it has been adverted to several times—in keeping up the price of wheat in order to avoid the draft upon the Treasury which otherwise would result from the redemption of its promise. What about all the rest of the public, engaged in various lines of production? There have been constant investigations here of the Union Stockyards companies for some time. Investigations have been on for some time of the packers—the so-called larger packers. There are many packers in the United States, but the investigation is addressed chiefly to the five large packers in Chicago. Notwithstanding they take up from 35 to 40 per cent only of all the food-producing animals in the United States, they are made the objects of the investigation; and much criticism has appeared for many years of them and their methods of transacting business.

By turning to the market reports I find that the price of hogs on the hoof is maintained at $17.50 per hundred. Cattle prices run from $17 to $19.75 a hundred. Those are not the prices made by the packers. They are the prices the packers pay to the owners of the live stock. They are not the prices made by the United States alone, although there is a guaranteed price that shall not fall below $17.50 on hogs. When it goes above that figure it is the price made by the general market and measured by the demand and market conditions generally throughout the country and the world. The packers to-day are loaded up with high-priced stock, bought at $17.50 to $18.50 a hundred for hogs, and from $17 to $20 a hundred for beef on the hoof. Their inventory values are based on the cost price of the live animal. They are literally carrying hundreds of millions of dollars of inventory values at high prices for the stock. Who guarantees to them that the prices may not fall? Nobody. The packers must go out upon the open market and sell their product. There is no guaranty by the Government of anything corresponding to $2.26 a bushel for wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. Undoubtedly the Senator is correct in his statement that there is no law providing for any guaranty to the packers; but I am sure he will not say that the packers do not have an understanding with certain officials of the Government as to what they shall pay, nor that they do not have an understanding that they will be allowed to sell these products so as not to sustain a loss. We have had such testimony before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry very recently; and I will say to the Senator that to-day the packers were instructed to pay 17½ cents for hogs, of course with only a gentleman's agreement that the Government, or certain Government officials—Food Administration officials, of course—would see to it that no loss would be sustained. Is the Senator aware of that fact?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am, and have been for a long time. If the Senator is through with the inquiry, I will make some comment on it.

Hog prices are fixed, as stated, at $17.50 by the express consent of the Food Administration. The Food Administration—I do not know what particular officer; at one time Mr. Cotton, at another time somebody else, but acting with the advice and consent of Mr. Hoover—made a $17.50 rate on hogs. Certain understandings were arrived at on cattle. They were to pay not less than so much. The avowed purpose of these minimum prices was to stimulate, as it did in the case of the wheat producer, the production of meat-producing animals. It was to get a great crop of hogs moving on into the packing-house centers, in order that the allies' armies and ours might be victualed. The commissary was calling for large contracts. There was, after 1916 and 1917 and before we entered the war, when our markets had supplied the allies with meats, a coming crisis in the hog and cattle production. The Government, I think wisely, in view at that time of the existing emergency, made a minimum price on live stock, just as they made a $2.26 guaranteed minimum price on wheat. They did it in order to induce the farmer and live-stock raiser to raise cattle and hogs, and furnish the basis of the commissary for this country and our allies.

The Senator again alludes to the fact—and it is true—that the packers were guaranteed, or were given to understand by a gentlemen's agreement, that they would suffer no loss in paying this minimum price, or whatever price should be thereafter fixed. It is a scale that is not absolutely binding. The Government can change it at pleasure, but it has not seen fit to do so up to this time. There was this gentlemen's agreement that when they sold their product on the market it would not be at a loss. The edible portion of cattle and hogs netted to the packers 9 per cent on the capital invested. That was the limitation made by the same Food Administration officers upon the profit of the packers on meat supplies. That is true also. They have confined themselves within the 9 per cent on the capital invested.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that this profit was not only upon the capital invested, but upon the surplus, upon all money borrowed, and upon all bonds. We have the absolute proof that it was not only upon the capital invested, but upon all money borrowed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it, and I have always understood, in every business enterprise that I have had anything to do with, that surplus available for dividends, not passed to dividend account and distributed to shareholders, and money derived from bond issues, all passing into the treasurer's hands and being held there, as well as capital stock and money borrowed upon the corporation's promissory notes at the bank, are capital invested in the trade or business.

I happen to have in mind the fact that there is money borrowed at the banks by one packer alone to the extent of more than $150,000,000, secured by collateral. That $150,000,000 was used in the Union Stockyards in Chicago to buy daily the cattle and hogs and sheep that came in, seeking a market at that point. Study the purchases of stock at these points, Mr. President. It will be seen that from 40 to 45 per cent and sometimes 50 per cent of the entire arrivals of live stock are bought by the small packers and not by the five large ones. The Brennan Packing Co., the Anglo Packing Co., the Hammond Packing Co., the Kingan Packing Co.—an Iowa concern originally—and many others are all of them known as the smaller packers.

When we refer to invested capital it is not merely the capital stock of the company at the time of incorporation. I know that certain gentlemen have had it appear otherwise. I am keeping in mind the fact that the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. President, in the case of one packing company in Chicago, accused them of making grossly abnormal profits on their sales on a $3,000,000 capitalization.

That $3,000,000 was the original capitalization of the company years ago, when the father of the sons who are now running the business was living. There was a pride in the father's management of the business, neither to water nor to capitalize the concern beyond the $3,000,000. Its credit was good. When it wanted more money, it went to the banks and borrowed it. It issued its promissory notes. Sometimes it issued its bonds; but it kept its credit good, so that it was never lacking for money. To-day its capitalization is still $3,000,000. That is the stock capitalization, but the actual capital invested in the business the last time I examined figures runs up to over $175,000,000—its surplus undistributed in dividends, its money derived from bonds, its money derived from short-time notes, borrowed from the banks, and all of it passed to its credit and accounted for as invested capital.

The Swifts years ago, when the senior Swift was alive, were under a conservative management. He died and left the business to his sons. The family and other shareholders run the business. The senior Morris did the same thing. Edward Morris became the head of the business after his father's death and managed it until his death. There is not a dollar of watered stock in the original capital of either of those concerns or the other packers. They have borrowed since the war came literally millions of dollars to meet the great obligations that they have undertaken, on behalf of the Government, to furnish the commissary of the Army and the Navy with the necessary meat supplies.

Philip Armour founded the house of Armour & Co. He died some years ago, and Ogden Armour became the head of the packing business. To-day its securities are quoted and sold upon the stock market. They are listed in the great stock exchanges of the country. They, like the other large packers, furnish their treasury with the necessary cash to meet emergencies, with the rise and fall of markets and with great war contracts assumed, by going to the banks and borrowing money. More than that, they issue their promissory notes, which pass into the hands of note brokers, and are sold in the market outside of the banks. That is a recognized process of raising money; and all of these means have been employed during the war, or since they have assumed these contracts.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want the Senator from Illinois to misunderstand me. I was not criticizing the packers in saying that they water their stock. I think they are very sound institutions. I was simply going to call the attention of my good friend from Illinois to the treatment accorded those people by Mr. Hoover and by the Food Administration.

If the testimony given to the committee of which I have the honor to be a member is false, then of course the statement which I am about to make is also false. But the statement has been made to the committee that never in the history of the packing industry have they made as much profit as they have made under the control of the Food Administration. The expert accountant who was before the committee on last Saturday stated the net profits of just one concern alone—Swift & Co.—after setting aside a sufficient amount of money for income tax and for excess-profits tax, was $47,000,000, whereas in ordinary times, in normal times, and before they were under the control of the Government, their profits never exceeded $6,000,000. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under Mr. Hoover or under the Food Administration control the packers have been treated very liberally.

The Senator is right in assuming that these men have borrowed large sums of money. That is true. That has been stated to us. One concern alone has at times borrowed $150,000,000, but the more they borrow, I want to say, the more profit they make, because they can borrow at 5 per cent and they are allowed to make 9 per cent profit.

Mr. SHERMAN. How much is Mr. Ford allowed to make on the Eagle submarine chasers?

Mr. GRONNA. I can not speak for Mr. Ford.

Mr. SHERMAN. He is allowed to make 10 per cent, to begin with, and then has had advances of $3,500,000 from the Government Treasury over here on the hill in order to start him in business. He and his son Edsel had to have Government help and got it, and got their 10 per cent profits, and the packers get 9 per cent on the volume of business. In the five largest packing houses in Chicago on every dollar turned over their per cent of profit is the lowest ever known. I will give the figures here. This is their per cent on each dollar of the volume of business.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not dispute that, but I want to say to the Senator that their per cent for the last year was 300 per cent larger than it ever had been in the history of the packing industry.

Mr. SHERMAN Grant it; the increased volume of business handled by the packers every 12 months is much greater than that. That is the reason.

I will say further that the per cent of profit by the packers on each dollar's worth of volume of business of the five largest packers is less than the per cent of profit of the smaller packers. The smaller packers of the country, who absorb all the live stock purchased during the 12 months at the great primary markets of the country, except that taken by the five large packers, are making more profits on volume of business done than the large packers themselves. I expect when the question comes up to go into this, but not on this measure, because it is foreign to the investigation of this matter and I wish to conclude this evening. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is correct. He has the advantage of a practical working knowledge of markets, and places the responsibility for prices and profits on the Government officers, to whom it belongs.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator may have given the figures before; but why not give us the percentage of profit on the total output of the packers?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is about 1.80 per cent; but that is subject to correction.

Mr. WARREN. I remember that it is something less than 2 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is under 2 per cent and is less than at any other time in the history of the packers, the volume of their business considered.

The volume of business is very much greater than it is in normal times, as a matter of course. I only refer to the 9 per cent profit of the packers in order to show that they have not been treated as well even as other industries during the war. They have been limited in their profits.

Another thing that is literally true, and which I hope will be given to the committees having these multitudinous investigations on hand—the Interstate Commerce Committee and the Committee on Agriculture—is that the packers will buy a beef steer at the yards, slaughter it, take all the edible portion out, and sell it back to the same live-stock owner for less than they paid him for the steer. I have heard this challenged as an impossibility, but it is literally correct. There is no small packer who can do it. They make enough out of the other parts of the steer. I suppose the committee will pursue that in detail. I hope they will. The leather, the horns, the bones, the hair, the sinews, the muscles that are not available for meat purposes are converted into merchandise.

The odds and ends of clippings are converted into tankage and made food for swine. Nearly all the harmony that bursts from the magnificent orchestras in the places of amusement in Washington comes from the entrails of animals slaughtered at the stockyards. The harmonious catgut fretted by the fingers of every dilettante in this country comes from the bowels of some of the animals that furnish the edible part of the meat to the Army and to the private consumer. There is a profit made on that. But the fiddle-string industry is open to everybody who wants to follow it. There is no trust. Anybody who knows how to make them can do so. I have not heard of any investigation of that in the committee as yet. It is so with everything else.

I find some criticism in the Federal Trade Commission about the dividends paid by the Central Leather Co. It is said that some of the packers are large stockholders in that company. Regulate it? I have no objection to regulating it. I will vote almost to the limit for regulation of all the large concerns in my immediate constituency. I have no feeling in the matter. I can not have any prejudice for them. I will not permit myself to have any prejudice against them simply because they are large. I do not wish now to discuss that question, but I am growing infinitely weary of the attacks upon the packers. I propose to defend them in this body sufficiently to see that they have justice done to them. I propose to vote for all reasonable regulation of the packers and all the publicity possible connected with their business. I do not know of anything in this country recently, or within the last 15 years, that has had more publicity, with investigation heaped upon investigation, committee investigations one after the other, in State legislatures, in the House, and in the Senate, prosecutions upon indictments by grand juries, findings, ex parte and otherwise, of various public officials, followed by that of the Trade Commission, until I have come to the conclusion it is time that these enterprises have justice done to them in like manner as the small ones. I will take that up when the report of the committee is before the Senate in the proper way, at due length for whatever the merits of the case may justify.

But, Mr. President, speaking of dividends upon profits, referred to only inferentially and only incidentally as a part of this discussion, the United States Steel Co., the Inland Steel Co., the various subsidiary concerns handling iron and steel products, leather concerns, companies handling boots, shoes, Cavalry saddles, and all the military paraphernalia made from leather have paid substantial dividends. Woolen companies manufacturing woolen fabrics have paid large dividends. Cotton spinners and other factories fabricating cloth have paid large dividends. Telephone companies have paid dividends, and the cable companies have done likewise.

I wish to take time by the forelock now and say that Theodore N. Vail, who is Mr. Burleson's assistant, is more interested in unloading the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. upon the United States than he is in the ultimate effect it will have upon the morale of the American people after it is done. He is interested in and has been interested in this scheme for several years, and Mr. Burleson knows it. He is a Bolshevist in the telephone, telegraph, and cable world in disguise. He ought not to sail in Washington under any false colors. His views are generally known. He believes in Government ownership for the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., because it is the best prospect of unloading that he sees in the immediate future. The public have not taken very kindly to telephone stock concerned in that investment, and so he sees a possible purchaser in the Government. That is the reason why he and Mr. Burleson have found themselves to be kindred spirits and are engaged in a common enterprise, though from entirely different motives. Mr. Vail undertook to gather in all forms of wire communication on land and sea into his company. He failed. He now, with Burleson, is trying the same thing in the name of the Government.

President Wilson in his cable message the other day said:

> Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward from Russia. It is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food, and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance.

I do not propose, for my part, to feed the organized crime of any country in order to stop its advance. Part of this money, under the existing form of the bill, will go to these people. There is only one cure for Bolshevism, and that is military force. It is the same kind of force they use, and like must meet like.

Feed them? They have exhausted themselves, just as the German exhausted himself trying to murder and rob his neighbors. They now find themselves in a starving condition. Their victims, if they can be reached, ought to be the object of our national charity; but to put food in the area where such bloodthirsty vagrants can seize it will only be to nourish and strengthen their arms to destroy our forces now in the vicinity of Archangel.

This is a harsh law, but they are reaping as they sowed. Before one dollar of this be voted to that element or put in a place where it is possible they may seize it they who have brought such calamity on Russia ought to die by the pangs of famine. They have brought that harsh judgment upon themselves by their violence, the disorder they have created, and the crimes they have committed.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, at the suggestion of some Senators in my vicinity I have modified my amendment and I will ask the chairman of the committee to accept it, in order that it may go to conference for consideration there.

I realize that perhaps the original amendment is rather loosely drawn and is subject to a good deal of misconstruction and misunderstanding. I only wanted to draw attention to the point that if the United States Government, by reason of price fixing, had a large surplus on hand in storehouses it was only reasonable that their contribution of wheat should come from this wheat already in their custody. I will therefore modify the amendment so as to read as follows:

> And provided further, That so far as said fund shall be expended for the purchase of wheat to be donated, preference shall be given to grain grown in the United States.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, without meaning to indicate that I am in accord with that amendment, I am very willing that it may be adopted and go to conference.

Mr. PENROSE. I will offer it as a substitute, then, to go to conference.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, until I inquire into the amendment somewhat further, I shall object to it. I may not do so to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. I will offer it as a substitute, then, and let it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). The amendment is offered as a substitute and will be printed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may it be stated from the desk? The Senator read it, but where I sat it was impossible to quite hear it. I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is made that the amendment may be stated by the Secretary. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "session," it is proposed to insert:

> And provided further, That so far as said fund shall be expended for the purchase of wheat to be donated, preference shall be given to grain grown in the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well. I do not wish to delay the bill. Then, as I understand, the amendment is accepted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am very willing that it be accepted, but I do not wish to be misunderstood as expressing myself in accord with it. It shall go to conference, however.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator withhold the motion for a few moments?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary read three paragraphs which I have marked with a pencil. If Senators desire the whole article read, I would prefer to have it so read. It relates to the proceedings pending before the Committee on Privileges and Elections in connection with the Michigan senatorial contest. I ask that it may be read as I have indicated, and after it is read I shall have a brief statement to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the three paragraphs which appear below.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Secretary, at my suggestion, has read only a portion of the article. I ask that the whole article, including the headlines, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

The article referred to is as follows:

FORD MEN TRY TRICK INQUIRY—POMERENE ATTEMPTS TO SMUGGLE PROBE RESOLUTION THROUGH DESERTED SENATE—SOLITARY REPUBLICAN HALTS SNAP ACTION—NEWBERRY FORCES PLEDGE ALL AID TO PRESERVE EVIDENCE IN PRIMARY FIGHT.

[From the Washington bureau of the Detroit Free Press.]

WASHINGTON, January 17.

Two examples came to light to-day in Washington of the lengths to which the Democratic Party, or some of its members, are prepared to go to overrule the verdict of the Michigan voters in electing Truman H. Newberry to the Senate.

Just before the Senate adjourned this afternoon Senator POMERENE, of Ohio, Democratic chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, rose in the Chamber, which was almost deserted, and offered a resolution, which he tried to smuggle through and to have passed without reading. It happened that Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, Republican, from New Jersey, was listening, and he promptly demanded that the resolution be read, and upon hearing it objected to its consideration, thus sending it over for the day. It was thereupon referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Both Senators SMITH and TOWNSEND had left the Chamber before the Ohio chairman made his move. In fact, hardly a handful of Senators were on hand, and but for the faithfulness of Senator FRELINGHUYSEN the resolution would have been adopted.

WOULD GIVE FULL POWER.

The resolution gives authority to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, to take possession of all ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and other documents and records connected with the Michigan senatorial election, and directs the committee or a subcommittee thereof to proceed with all convenient speed to take all necessary steps for the preservation of evidence as to the various matters alleged in the petition of Henry Ford and of any alleged fraud, irregularity, and unlawful expenditure of money in the election and primary, and as to intimidation of voters and other facts affecting the result of the election.

The committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate or during any recess of the Senate or of Congress, at any place and time, and to exercise the usual powers of congressional probing committees in the way of authority to compel testimony. It would also take possession of and hold disputed ballots.

A preamble sets forth that information has been received that in certain localities in Michigan some of the ballots are being destroyed and others likely to be destroyed "unless they are taken possession of by the Senate for the purpose of preserving and recounting the same."

POMERENE ACTS ALONE.

Chairman POMERENE'S action in thus attempting to smuggle through the resolution was taken without authority from his committee, which met this morning and adjourned until to-morrow morning after hearing counsel for both parties to the contest. It will come as a surprise to members of the committee, both Republican and Democratic, as they supposed when they left the committee room that the matter was put over until the morning session and nothing would be done in regard to it.

The prediction is made to-night that POMERENE'S course will tend to alienate his Democratic colleagues on the committee and will further diminish the chances of getting action by the present Senate, a majority of the committee having heretofore voted that the contest did not come within the jurisdiction of this session.

The other action that disclosed the determination of the Ford supporters to snatch every advantage, fair and unfair, in behalf of their candidate, was taken by Alfred Lucking at the hearing before the committee this morning.

The hearing was held under a resolution adopted by the committee last Wednesday by which an invitation was extended to the parties and their counsel to appear to-day and confer upon means of proving the evidence relating to the election.

LUCKING MAKES A SPEECH.

This was all the invitation included, but as soon as he got an opportunity to speak Lucking started on a lengthy harangue dealing with every detail of the reiterated allegations of fraud and intimidation and proceeded to make a fiery speech about everything conceivable except the preservation of the ballots.

The purpose of his proceeding became evident soon. A manifold copy of his speech was sent to the Senate press gallery and put at the disposal of newspaper correspondents with the plan that it would thus get nation-wide circulation and the Ford allegations would find a hearing everywhere.

H. E. Bodman, of Detroit, counsel for Newberry, followed the Lucking outburst with a flat-footed denial of every allegation of fraud or impropriety in the election. He told the committee that he did not intend to do more than deny them at this stage of the matter, as they were not properly before the committee under the resolution which called the meeting, but that at the proper time the charges that have been given such widespread circulation would be fully met and refuted in every detail.

NEWBERRY TO AID PROBE.

The matter before the committee, he said, was the best method of preserving the ballots, and in this Newberry supporters were ready to aid in every way possible. It is a subject, he contended, solely within the field of the legislature of the State. A bill is being put through the legislature as speedily as possible for the purpose and the governor will sign it as soon as it is passed. The ballots have been destroyed in three cities already, Marquette, Port Huron, and Saginaw. In two of these cities elections were held in December and the boxes were needed, while in the other the election officials followed the usual procedure under the law of the State.

"Mr. Ford had publicly declared that he would not seek a recount, and there was no reason for doing otherwise than is always done in the State with election ballots," said Mr. Bodman.

The committee voted to have its meetings open to the public hereafter and adjourned until to-morrow morning. Afterwards Chairman POMERENE made his effort to get snap judgment in the Senate.

It developed during the hearing this morning that one of the cities where the ballots were destroyed, Saginaw, was carried by Ford in the election. The fact furnished a curious commentary on the heated accusations of Lucking that the destruction of ballots was a partisan trick.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in view of the statements made in this article, I desire to make a brief statement.

The resolution was prepared by myself, I think either Saturday or perhaps Monday preceding the Thursday on which we had a meeting with regard to this contest. On January 14, which was last Tuesday, there was a meeting of the committee. I had instructed the clerk of the committee to prepare copies of the resolution and lay them before the members of the committee. I am told they were on the table at that time. On Tuesday, instead of taking any action, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] introduced the following resolution in the committee, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Hon. Henry Ford and the Hon. Truman H. Newberry, either in person or by their attorneys, be invited to appear before the committee on Friday, January 17, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m. to advise with the committee relative to the steps necessary to be taken to preserve the evidence in the election contest of the said Henry Ford.

We then adjourned to meet on Friday at 10.30 o'clock. At that time copies of this resolution, which is now known as Senate resolution 415, were on the table before each member of that committee. After a conference, lasting for perhaps an hour or an hour and a half, the committee recessed until the afternoon. In the afternoon we again recessed until Saturday morning. Meanwhile, in order that this resolution might be formally before the committee, I decided that I would offer the resolution in the Senate and ask to have it referred to the committee.

On Friday evening, because of engagements I had at my office, I was not able to be in the Chamber. I thereupon asked my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], to offer this resolution for me. The RECORD for January 17, page 1607, shows this:

Mr. ASHURST. At the request of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who has just been called from the Chamber, and on his behalf, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask that the resolution just submitted be read by title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

Though the RECORD itself does does not show it, the Journal shows this:

Mr. ASHURST (for Mr. POMERENE) submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The article from this paper says that I rose, that I presented the resolution, and that I tried to smuggle it through the Senate in the absence of the Senators from Michigan.

I submit that the young man who wrote that article is not fit to associate with newspaper men. I submit further that if any newspaper published that article knowing the facts that paper is not fit to circulate. My belief is that, if this be a reputable paper, when it finds out what the facts are, if it does not know them now, it will make a retraction, will apologize for this article, and will dismiss that young man from its service.

I felt that I owed this statement to the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, on the evening that this resolution was introduced for the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] I had just left the Senate Chamber a few minutes before. I received a telephone call from some one telling me that such a resolution had been introduced; that immediate consideration had been asked for it, but that Senator FRELINGHUYSEN had requested that it be read, and that the matter went over.

I was also informed that a copy of the resolution would be sent up to my room in a short time. Meanwhile I called up the Senator from New Jersey, and he stated to me the exact facts as the RECORD discloses them. So, of course, the statement of the Senator from Ohio is absolutely correct. There was no foundation of fact for the statement that any unusual or improper methods were employed by the Senator from Ohio, but, as I say, that was not the first report that came to me. How the misunderstanding arose I do not know. I do not believe that it was intentional.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the junior Senator from Michigan for making that statement. The facts are as I have given them, and that is all I care to say on the subject at this time.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 21, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, Thy divine influence guided our fathers in the formation of our Republic, which, through all the vicissitudes of the past, has grown strong and prosperous. Its gates have been thrown wide open for the depressed and downtrodden of all peoples. We have received all comers and made them welcome.

But a class have grown up among us and become a menace to good government, and are seeking by nefarious methods to undermine the sacred principles we love; and we pray that they may be given to understand by our authorities that they are not wanted in this country; that the American flag is the only flag that we recognize and hold sacred.

If they can not conform to our methods, our Government, then, in God's name, let them depart from among us that we may continue to live in peace and prosperity. In Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 18, 1919, and of Sunday, January 19, 1919, was read and approved.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the census bill, disagree to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the census bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennesse asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to request for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, personally I have not examined the Senate amendments, but I heard that the Senate had incorporated an amendment providing for the selection of census employees through the Civil Service Commission under the merit system. Is that correct?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think a large number of them are to be selected in that way, in accordance with the amendment adopted by the Senate. It provides that the supervisors shall be appointed upon civil-service examination.

Mr. MANN. Is it just the supervisors?

Mr. HOUSTON. It does not apply to the enumerators. Perhaps most of the other employees are to be selected under the civil-service rules.

Mr. MANN. I have not read the amendment in the RECORD, and I think the bill has not yet been printed in the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill has been printed with the Senate amendments numbered.

Mr. MANN. Then it has come in this morning. I have not seen it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say for the information of the gentleman that the civil-service requirement in the amendment added by the Senate provides only for the additional clerks and employees provided by section 6, which refers to the clerical force required in the compilation of the census and not to the field force.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I understand it, it applies to the supervisors, but not to the enumerators.

Mr. STAFFORD. I got this bill only this morning. I have the bill before me. As I read it, it applies merely to the clerical force and not to the field force.

Mr. MANN. I am under the impression that the Senate agreed to an amendment providing for the appointment of supervisors by the President, to be confirmed by the Senate. I am not sure——

Mr. HOUSTON. Also, with a proviso that it shall be after they have taken a civil-service examination.

Mr. MANN. I really can not see, if they are to be appointed by a civil-service examination, why they need to be named by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Did the House bill, as it passed the House, contain any provision for the appointment of the census clerks through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. HOUSTON. All of them, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was not here when that bill passed, but as it was reported to the House it contained that provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] was in charge of the bill when it passed the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. A strong effort was made at that time to bring them within the civil-service requirements of existing law. That effort was resisted by the other side and was unsuccessful.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the census bill going to conference as soon as possible, but I think the House is entitled to a vote upon this provision in the Senate amendment, that these clerks in the Census Office shall be selected through the merit system and not as a political propaganda.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is right.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing that the vote upon that proposition shall be taken at any reasonable time; and if the gentleman from Tennessee will agree that the House conferees will either agree to the substance of the amendment, or bring that particular amendment back to the House for a vote upon it, I have no objection to the bill going to conference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That request applies just to the office force, as I understand it, and not to the field force?

Mr. MANN. I do not know just what the Senate amendment is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It does not apply to the field force.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the Senate amendment covers, but what I have in mind is the office force.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, the gentleman does not want that foreclosed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, if the conferees fail to reach an agreement on that—or, in any event, I can not see any objection to having a separate vote on that question, so far as applies to this office force.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOUSTON. I can see no objection to a separate vote upon that proposition with regard to the office force.

Mr. MANN. Of course there can be no reason why there should be an objection to it, but will there be an opportunity for a separate vote?

Mr. HOUSTON. It strikes me as a little premature to ask for a separate vote now, although I have no objection to a separate vote.

Mr. MANN. If it is premature, then I will ask the gentleman to let this go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. MADDEN. If there is no agreement on that, we will not let this bill go to conference.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman will find, on page 10 of the bill, that it is amendment 25 which provides how the additional clerks as provided for in section 6 shall be selected, and all of them are under the civil service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the amendments the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has in mind are amendments numbered 13 and 14.

Mr. FOSTER. I am talking about amendment No. 25.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am referring to the amendments of the Senate under which the Director of the Census, so far as the employment of additional clerks is necessary, shall be required to take them from those who have taken the civil-service examination. I am fully acquainted with the amendments suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall read the language, just what it says. It is very plain.

Mr. STAFFORD. But suppose there should not be sufficient clerks upon the existing roll; then he would necessarily be privileged to appoint those outside of the civil service.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Unless the Senate amendment be agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not provide anything of that kind.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill as it passed the House provided that additional clerks and other employees provided by section 6 shall be subject to special test examinations as the Director of the Census may prescribe. The Senate amendment provides that it shall be done subject to the approval of the United States Civil Service Commission, and then it provides in Senate amendment No. 14 that the selections therefrom shall be made by the Director of the Census in the order of rating. I do not know that it cuts any particular figure.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood from the gentleman that that additional legislation of the Senate, to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] is not opposed, brings them all under the civil service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would postpone his request until to-morrow morning, when I think we will all be prepared.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall agree to the gentleman's request and postpone it until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his request.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 14746; H. Rept. 945) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order.

SOLDIERS' MAIL.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes, and in my time to have read a letter respecting the mail for wounded soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a letter to have read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., January 8, 1919.

Congressman JOHN F. MILLER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: As Congressman from this State, I am taking up with you certain matters in connection with soldiers' mail, overseas forces.

I believe if enough pressure is brought there will be a betterment of conditions. I am inclosing you herewith an envelope, returned to me, in which I wrote to my son in France on August 30. This letter was returned to me January 6.

My son was wounded in the St. Mihiel drive September 12, was released from the hospital October 1, went into battle on the 5th of October, and was again wounded and sent to the hospital. On November 30 he had not yet rejoined his company, due to the fact that his company had gone into Germany.

You can see by the inclosed envelope, which is one of 10 returned to me to-day, that his mail is being returned with the notations that he has been wounded. On November 29 he had had no pay since August and no mail since August, and presumably will not get any more of my letters, as they are being returned to this country. So much for that case.

Another case, that of Private Earl Smith, who left Seattle with the One hundred and sixty-first Infantry, has not received one letter of communication from his parents since last February—11 months. He was wounded at Soissons on the 18th of July, transferred from various hospitals, finally reaching debarkation hospital No. 3, New York City, about December 10. He is on the second floor, ward 3.

His people have written him several times, telegraphed him, and telegraphed money to him, but under date of December 31 he wrote his people that he had received no money since he was wounded in July and had received no letter or communication of any kind from them.

I have two other equally flagrant cases, where the boys were wounded in the battle of Cantigney on May 28, and they have received no pay or mail since that time, and are now returned to the United States for demobilization—still no pay.

If there is anything you can do to remedy this condition, I am sure your constituents will appreciate it.

Yours, very truly, CHAS. M. DIAL.

P. S.—While it is true this boy was wounded, can you tell me why he and other boys, because of their wounds, should be penalized by having their pay stopped and all of their mail withheld from them?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, or any member of that committee who is present this morning, if there is any promise of any betterment in the mail service to soldiers, and particularly wounded soldiers, and whether there is any promise of betterment in the payment of wounded soldiers. I would like to hear from any member of the committee, if there is any present, if there is any promise of betterment in this service, or, for that matter, from any other Member of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington will recall that the Committee on Military Affairs is probably in session this morning on the appropriation bill, which accounts for no member of that committee being present.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Then I would like to inquire of any other Member of the House if there is any promise of betterment in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a report of a special committee in the Pension Department, indicating those companies of rangers and Indian fighters in Texas who come within the provisions of the act of March 4, 1917. It is a matter in which over 1,000 applicants are interested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a special report from the Pension Department. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it a voluminous report?

Mr. BLANTON. No; not voluminous. It affects the rights of over 1,000 applicants, who are old residents of Texas, who performed services on the frontier fighting Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of how many pages does it consist?

Mr. BLANTON. It is strung out in a single column over a number of pages, but in the RECORD, I presume, it would cover only a few pages of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the purpose of printing it?

Mr. BLANTON. It will save a great deal of correspondence on the part of the 18 Members of Congress from the State of Texas, who are frequently called upon to answer requests from these people who are interested in this matter. Many of them are not entitled to pensions. This report would indicate to them immediately that they are not entitled to pensions, and it would tend to stop further correspondence and further hope in the matter.

Mr. LITTLE. Then, it is a matter of convenience to the gentleman and his constituents?

Mr. BLANTON. It is a matter of importance to all of the Members from Texas and their constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was ill in the hospital at the time the river and harbor appropriation bill and the $100,000,000 food emergency bill were passed in the House. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon those two measures.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the river and harbor appropriation bill and the emergency food bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES ON COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The first business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 95) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know whether anyone from the Committee on Public Lands wants to be heard on this bill, but I would like to ask the Delegate from Alaska whether, in his opinion, this bill ought to pass at this time?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. My opinion is that it ought not. I am very much opposed to this class of legislation for Alaska, and certainly am opposed to it until I can have an opportunity to be heard upon it before the committee.

Mr. MANN. Well, for the present, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the bill goes off.

AMENDMENT TO ESPIONAGE ACT.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9094) to amend section 1 of Title VIII of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have examined this bill. I suppose it was introduced and reported purely as a war measure. What is the special necessity for this provision now when we are about, let us hope, to have peace?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know the object of the introduction of the bill, which, I think, was introduced by the chairman of the committee, but it was considered by the committee and reported by me as part of the regular business of the committee, and the Department of State stated that it is not confined in its utility to a war measure, but that it is necessary as an amendment to the existing statute protecting applications made to the State Department, protecting the State Department against fraud which may be perpetrated upon it, and that in that sense it is not a war measure.

Mr. MANN. Well, it was introduced January 22, 1918, and reported June 18, 1918. The dates in the subject matter will show it was introduced and reported as a war measure.

Mr. GARD. It was introduced during the time we were actively at war; yes.

Mr. MANN. It provides, among other things—whoever shall willfully and knowingly present to the Department of State such false or untrue statement, with intent to influence its action with respect to the protection of such person or concern—

And so forth—

shall be fined or imprisoned.

That is the amendment.

Mr. GARD. That is the only amendment to it, the gentleman knows.

Mr. MANN. Well, here is a penal offense in time of peace for a man who presents an untrue statement. He does not have to swear to it. He may be absolutely innocent and may not know the statement is untrue and may believe it to be true. And he is not under oath.

Mr. GARD. Oh, no, the gentleman is mistaken about that. If he reads the language of the amendment, he will see whoever shall willfully and knowingly present to the Department of State, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen frequently willfully and knowingly present documents to the Department of State. The law has frequently been construed. All it requires is that he knowingly presents it.

Mr. GARD. Well, "willfully" is construed as meaning purposely.

Mr. MANN. Well, I purposely present it; I willfully present it, but I do not know it is false; but suppose I do know it is false, are they going to send me to the penitentiary and leave that as a matter of proof to know whether I knew it was false or not? They have to prove it is false, and the presumption will be I presented it not knowing it was false. The presumption is in this House that when a man introduces a bill he knows what is in it, but we all know that of a very large share of the bills which are presented by Members they do not know what is in them, but they introduce them at the request of some people in whom they believe, and do not pretend to be responsible for everything in the bill.

Mr. GARD. The bill is introduced at the request of the State Department, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. MANN. As this bill was?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I am frank to say that.

Mr. MANN. That is the case with many bills.

Mr. GARD. A considerable number are since the department necessarily must know the weakness of the law.

Mr. MANN. This bill was willfully and knowingly introduced in the House, in the language of the amendment, but the gentleman who introduced it is perhaps unable to give careful examination of the bill before he introduces it because he probably introduces it merely at the suggestion and request of the State Department in order to have it printed and up for consideration. I think we go a long ways. Here is a propaganda going on now in reference to the payment by this Government of a large sum of money to the Republic Colombia. A great many statements are being made on both sides of the question endeavoring to influence the State Department and also the Congress upon the subject. A great many of those statements are falsehoods because they are directly contradictory of each other. They can not all be true yet it is proposed, in order to prevent men endeavoring to get their rights or what they claim are their rights, that if they make a statement that is not true they shall not only be subject to the ordinary penalties of perjury but they shall be subject to an additional offense, a penitentiary offense. Now, I can understand why as a war measure we might want to prevent false statements concerning the war or the relationship with the allies being presented to the State Department, but as a permanent policy of the Government, while I do not believe in presenting false statements to the State Department, I doubt very much the desirability of fining or imprisoning a man because he has done something of that sort which he may have thought was true and which he did in good faith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I ask to have the bill passed over——

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman desire to offer any amendment?

Mr. MANN. I have not given it sufficient consideration to offer an amendment, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is a growing sentiment in this country, especially since the armistice was signed, favoring the repeal of many of the restrictive measures that were passed during the war. I find that a great many business men are complaining that it is almost impossible for them to do business in competition with their foreign competitors because of conditions that we imposed upon them while the war was in progress. I find a great many individuals are complaining that they are not free in this country—which is supposed to be a country of freemen—to give utterance to their thoughts and beliefs within ordinarily legitimate lines because of many of the acts that we passed to safeguard this country during the war. It seems to me the time has come when rather than increase these restrictions we should begin to repeal them. And I, for one, intend to watch this kind of legislation so far as I am able while in the House, with a view to checking any more acts that will hamstring the business man and deny the individual the ordinary peace-time privileges of citizens of the United States.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARD. This is not such a question. This is a law that has been on the statute books for a long time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Since the gentleman is more familiar with this law than I am, I would like to ask him a question. It appears that anyone who makes false statements to the State Department, as provided in this amendment, would be subject to a fine of $5,000 and imprisonment of not more than five years, or both. Who is to determine whether the statement is willfully or knowingly false?

Mr. GARD. The case would be submitted to a jury, and the jury would determine, under the instructions of a court, whether it is false or willfully or knowingly presented. I would say to the gentleman that I have no objections, if the gentleman thinks it would be better, to provide an amendment in the bill that whoever shall willfully and knowingly present to the State Department such false and untrue statements, knowing the same to be false and untrue, to tend to influence action——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to protect no man who makes a willfully false statement for the purpose of deceiving the State Department, but I am frank to say to the gentleman, having watched this matter somewhat carefully and referring to the particular case to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] referred a little while ago, that of a certain propaganda, that I am inclined to believe that many of these false statements that seem to annoy the State Department do not come from the people of the United States, but come largely from people outside of the United States who have designs upon the United States, and I do not feel that we ought to legislate in favor of those people. Take the particular instance to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has referred, where it is possible false statements might be made not necessarily by citizens of the United States, but by those who are representative of foreign countries who are acting within the United States and who are seeking to get money from the United States.

Mr. GARD. This bill, as the gentleman knows, requires a statement to be under oath before a person authorized and empowered to administer oaths.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman why the laws against perjury do not apply to those cases? I know what the existing law is in reference to this matter. Why does not the law against perjury and providing the penalties for perjury apply to a man who knowingly swears to a falsehood and then presents the paper to the State Department?

Mr. GARD. I do not believe there is any statute that provides for punishment for perjury in a case such as this. I am frank to say I have not examined into it with that object in view, but I do not believe the perjury statute would apply to the case. It refers to a statement made willfully and knowingly under oath—a false statement. It is intended to protect the State Department against the imposition of such false statements knowingly made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of any case in point that provoked the suggestion for this new legislation?

Mr. GARD. I know that in the statement given by the Secretary of State it says this:

> There appears to be no provisions in the Federal Penal Code defining as an offense the making of false representations under oath to the Secretary of State under circumstances of the character indicated in the proposed amendment. It will be observed therefore that, at the present time, persons may with impunity submit false oaths to this department for the purpose of obtaining assistance and protection to which they are not properly entitled. As such assistance and protection often entails negotiations with foreign Governments, it is important to determine with precision the facts of the particular cases involved, and as the department must in a great measure rely upon the affidavits of the parties in interest, you will readily perceive that it is very desirable that the making of false affidavits in such cases should be prevented, so far as possible, by severe penalties, rather than be left to be regulated, as is now the case, merely by the moral sense of right of the affiants, whose personal interests in most instances are involved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I submit to the gentleman there is absolutely nothing in that statement that has any relevancy to war problems at all. This is a proposition——

Mr. GARD. I have been trying to state that it is not a war problem——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why amend an espionage act that sooner or later may be repealed? Why not bring that in as new legislation, to be considered on its merits at the proper time? I am frank to say to the gentleman that I expect there will be a demand for the repeal of the espionage act. Why add to the difficulties already encountered under that act, which may be repealed shortly, by the introduction of general legislation, to apply in peace times and which may be meritorious from that point of view?

I submit to the gentleman that I shall object to unanimous consent. However, I do not want to interfere with the discussion.

Mr. MANN. The statement of the State Department, as read by the gentleman, may be correct. It may be assumed that the State Department is correct. Yet it is a startling statement to say that a man who willfully commits perjury in filing papers with the State Department can not be punished for perjury because legally it is not perjury. If a man swears falsely to an affidavit to get anything out of any other department of the Government, he is subject to the pain of perjury. But according to the State Department you can file any old paper with that department, swear to anything if it is to go to the State Department, and that is not perjury. Well, if that is true, it ought to be corrected. I know that is what the State Department says. If the State Department could be punished for all the misinformation that comes from that department, they would all be in jail.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. The letter from the Department of State goes on to show that many of these claims presented to the State Department are from foreign corporations, and that there are no means whatsoever for reaching those foreign corporations after the State Department has been duped by the presentation of their claims. Though it is an American corporation, the membership is largely composed of aliens, and there is no opportunity whereby the State Department can reach the real parties who have been instrumental in deceiving the State Department in taking action in presenting a claim against a foreign government.

This bill is intended to protect the State Department, so that when it uses its good offices to present a claim against Mexico or any other foreign government it may be certain that the information is true and not false. That is shown on the second page, as the gentleman is well aware.

Mr. GARD. That is unquestionably the object of the bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the language of the amendment at the top of page 3. I think perhaps what was intended by the committee on that amendment was to fix a penalty for the presentation by any person of a paper, the contents of which the person presenting same knew to be false. That is not what this amendment now reads to me.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman have in mind an amendment providing that it was known to be false?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TOWNER. Because that is the very proposition involved. A client engaged in a lawsuit should not be made responsible in perjury for the false statements of a witness in his behalf. He might be guilty of subornation of perjury if he endeavored to get him to testify to facts he knew to be false. This amendment just now reads, "or whoever shall willfully and knowingly present to the Department of State such false or untrue statement with intent to influence its action with respect to the protection of such persons or concerns." Of course, a man might willfully and knowingly present a statement of somebody else to the department with or without knowledge of its contents; but before he can be convicted it should be shown that he not only knowingly presented it but had knowledge of the fact that the affidavit was untrue. That, no doubt, is what was intended.

Mr. GARD. As I said to the gentleman before, I have no objection to incorporating that language in the amendment. I think that that language in the amendment to the bill is safeguarded, and the Department of State is protected in its very proper desire to afford all assistance possible to American citizens and corporations and everyone else having business with the State Department. If the bill can be proceeded with, I am frank to say that I shall be glad to offer the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, and other amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 13143) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of New Orleans, La.

I will state that it extends by two and five years the time for the construction of a bridge or tunnel across the Mississippi River at New Orleans. It was approved by the War Department and comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with a favorable report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the special reason at this early hour for taking it up out of its regular course?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I have intended to call it up for some time, and I deferred calling it up when the appropriation bills were before the House so as not to interfere with the procedure. I do not know whether this bill will be reached or not to-day, but the people behind it are pressing me to get it passed. It will not take more than a minute to pass it if we reach it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13143) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of New Orleans, La.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the gentleman who introduced the bill whether under the original act—this bill seeks to extend the time for commencing and completing the work—authorization is carried for the construction of a tunnel or tunnels under the river?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Yes, sir. The original act was drawn in that way by the direction and at the suggestion of the Secretary of War. The present bill, as the gentleman will note if the gentleman has the bill before him, states the exact situation as it was in the original legislation. I did not think it is necessary to go into all the details. The War Department, however, insisted on all these amendments, which are merely verbiage.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will state to the gentleman that I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection. The Clerk will report the bill in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved August 8, 1916, to be built at or near the city of New Orleans, La., by the city of New Orleans, are hereby extended to two and five years, respectively, from the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La., or for the construction of a tunnel or tunnels under said river in lieu of said bridge."

With committee amendments, as follows:

On page 1, line 6, strike out the words "at or" and insert the words "across the Mississippi River."

After the word "near," in line 6, page 1, insert the words "and above."

And at the end of line 7, after the words "New Orleans," insert the words "or for constructing a tunnel or tunnels under said river in lieu of the bridge."

Amend the title.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, the title should be amended.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. DUPRÉ, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO ESPIONAGE ACT.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 9094, to which objection was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], may be permitted to retain its place on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to retain its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIGHT TO CUT TIMBER FOR AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13056) to grant to citizens of Modoc County, Cal., the right to cut timber in the State of Nevada for agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, and to remove such timber to Modoc County, Cal.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, chapter 561, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1891, chapter 559, page 1093, volume 26, United States Statutes at Large, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Interior to grant permits under the provisions of the eighth section of the act of March 3, 1891, to citizens of Modoc County, Cal., to cut timber in the State of Nevada for agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, and to remove the timber so cut to Modoc County, State of California."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LANDS AT YELLOWSTONE, MONT., FOR HOTEL PURPOSES.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 41) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Yellowstone, Mont., for hotel and other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] is there any other land at the entrance to Yellowstone National Park which is owned in fee by any private corporation or individual?

Mr. EVANS. I doubt if there is any land other than that owned by the railroad company there. This is through a forest reserve.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should we grant this preferential right to the railroad company when other individuals can not secure title to Government land in that neighborhood? It grants a virtual monopoly to the railroad company for the purpose of erecting and managing a hotel there.

Mr. EVANS. The railroad company is transporting and taking care of people there at the entrance to the park. There is no other way in which people can be taken care of unless somebody is given the opportunity, and neither the railroad company nor anybody else wants to spend several hundred thousand dollars in putting up a hotel there on other people's land. The land is in the forest reserve. It is of no particular value. Although it is to be sold to the railroad company at the rate of $25 an acre, I dare say it is not worth $2.50 an acre.

This bill was sent to me by the Secretary of the Interior. The purpose of it is to accommodate the people who travel through the park.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is just the fact that it may create a monopoly——

Mr. EVANS. I think not. The hotel is to be conducted under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, as all the park hotels are.

Mr. MANN. I think it is all right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. EVANS. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to sell and convey to Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Utah and authorized to do business in the State of Montana, its successors and assigns, for hotel and other purposes, and at a price to be fixed by appraisement at not less than $25 per acre, and under such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, the following-described lands, situated in Gallatin County, Mont.: Lot 3 and the northeast ¼ of the southwest ¼ of section 34, in township 13 south, of range 5 east, Montana principal meridian, including the area at present covered by the right of way for the wye tracks of said Oregon Short Line Railroad Co.; also all that portion of the southeast ¼ of the northwest ¼ of said section 34 lying south of the right of way and station grounds of said company, the entire tract above described consisting of 88.02 acres; the right of way and station grounds of said Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. and the right of way for the wye tracks of said company being designated in the filing map of the Yellowstone Park Railroad Co. filed with the Secretary of the Interior, the land described being within the boundaries of the Madison National Forest: Provided, however, That any hotel erected on said lands shall be operated by the said Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., or its successors in interest, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for the conduct and operation of hotels within the Yellowstone National Park.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SETTLERS ON CERTAIN RAILROAD LANDS IN MONTANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 935) for the relief of settlers on certain railroad lands in Montana.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I have conferred with some gentlemen who are interested in this bill, and, so far as they are concerned, it has been agreed that the bill may be passed over and retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. These bills ought to go to the foot of the calendar. It seems to me unfair to other members to pass over bills and leave them on the calendar to be called ahead of other bills all the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that this bill go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2552) to provide for a leave of absence for homestead entrymen in one or two periods and for longer times.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, as I recall, this bill provides for dividing the time of annual absence of homestead entrymen into more than one period?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The present homestead law requires seven months' actual residence and allows five months' leave of absence in each year on every homestead claim. A year or so ago we passed a law allowing that five months' leave of absence to be in either one or two times.

Mr. MANN. I remember the law, and I remember the facts.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Allowing the entryman to divide the five months' leave of absence into two parts if he so desires.

Mr. MANN. This bill allows "for climatic reasons only" a reduction of the time for residence from seven months to six months in each year.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It provides for six months' leave of absence and six months' residence instead of seven in any one year, and extends the time of homestead residence period before final proof from three years to four; in other words, requiring 24 months of actual residence, whereas the present law requires only 21 months' actual residence, extended over three years, before a man can prove up and obtain patent. This bill only applies to homestead claims located in high altitudes in the mountainous West. In the extreme higher altitudes this bill allows seven months' leave of absence and only requires five months' actual residence each year, but requires the homesteader to put in five years' time and 25 months' actual residence on his claim before he can prove up and obtain a patent. So that while this bill may be looked upon as a relief measure, as a matter of fact it is a very harsh relief measure. It penalizes a man for his misfortune. It makes him live either four or five years on his claim instead of three years before patent can be obtained, and requires either 24 or 25 months' actual residence instead of 21 months, as the present law provides.

No man will ever avail himself of the provisions of this bill unless the deep snows of the mountains drive him to it. But, nevertheless, there are thousands of places in the Rocky Mountains where even these unnecessarily harsh provisions will be a godsend to a poor man and his family who are trying to make a home.

Mr. MANN. Where is there a place in the West where people can take up homesteads, where the climatic conditions are such as to forbid a man living on the land more than six months in a year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. All over the mountainous portions of the West, where the land is from 7,000 or 8,000 to 10,000 or 11,000 feet altitude, the snow is so deep that they need this relief. Within a few miles of my own home town the snow at this time is probably 8 or 10 feet deep.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; but this is not the time when the homesteaders live on the land.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The idea is this: The snow commences to fall in September or October and does not go off until June, and there are not seven working months on the land in a year, and there is no use compelling a man, as the law now does, to stay up there seven months each year. When the deep snows commence they want to take their families and stock and go down to a lower altitude and get out of the snow.

Mr. MANN. With leave to stay away five months, they are not required to be there at this time of the year.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; but they are required to be there seven months in the year, and that is about two months longer than they can do any good by staying up there. They can not get up on their claims to do any work before late in May or June, and there is no use compelling a man who is trying to open up and improve a claim, to make a home, to stay there in deep snow when he can not do anything.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but not in this month—not in the middle of winter.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They can not practically or usefully put in seven months in the year up there, during the first three or four years, while they are clearing, breaking, fencing, building, and trying to prepare a home, before they get title to their land. Afterwards, when they get well settled, they may and often do live up there all the year around.

Mr. MANN. How early in the season can they get up there? When does the snow melt?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Along in June; usually from about the middle of May to the middle of June, depending on the altitude. It varies somewhat.

Mr. MANN. Yet the gentleman proposes to have a homestead.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; there will be thousands of them that will ultimately make good homes. That is the richest soil in the world in those mountain parks.

Mr. MANN. Where the snow does not melt until June.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There are thousands and thousands of places throughout the higher latitudes all over the West where there are splendid little parks, from eight to ten thousand feet high, where the snow gets from 10 to 15 feet deep in the wintertime.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; I have been out there on the mountains where there is plenty of snow in August, and have stayed the year round, but what has that to do with the homestead question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. After these settlers get their claims cleared of scrub trees and brush and rock, and get the land broke and leveled and seeded in hay, and get the land fenced and build a good house and suitable barns and sheds for taking care of their stock they can then live up there on these claims longer and probably live there the year round. But that requires many years of most awfully hard work, and while they are improving their land, and establishing a home, and getting the ground under cultivation so that they can raise some timothy hay or rye, or fall wheat, something for themselves and their stock to live on, they can not go up there any earlier than about the 1st of June, and they have actually got to get out of there by about the middle of October or the 1st of November at the outside.

Mr. MANN. It would be a pretty short time in which to raise much of a crop if the snow did not melt until late in June and they had to leave there late in September.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As the gentleman knows, it does not melt until August in some places.

Mr. MANN. I know it does not, but I have not heard that they raise much rye or timothy in those places where the snow does not melt until August and commences to fall again in September.

Mr. GARD. Possibly they do not raise the rye from the ground.

Mr. MANN. Oh, out there they have to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know whether the House knows it or not, but as fine timothy hay as there is in the world can be raised clear up practically to the timber line, 11,000 feet high, hay as tall as your head.

Mr. MANN. The House does not know it, and notwithstanding the gentleman's assertion I doubt that the House knows it now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The House can know it. Anyone can find out. I know what I am talking about. I have lived there for nearly 40 years. The whole question before the House is whether or not you are in favor of encouraging homestead settlements in the West. If so, for Heaven's sake let us relieve the back-breaking and heartbreaking burdens of the settlers and enact some fair, common-sense conditions under which they can take up these rough and rugged, barren and worthless lands and by years and years of toil and privations transform them into productive American homes. When we begrudgingly extend the time from 21 to 24 months for the privilege of a six months' leave of absence, and harshly extend it from 21 months to 25 months for permission of a seven months' leave of absence, it seems to me that no fair-minded man can object to this bill. Because, I repeat, the settler is compelled to put in a five-year period if he only lives on his claim five months each year, and a four-year period instead of a three if he only puts in six months each year on his claim.

Mr. MANN. Everyone here is in favor of doing anything that is practical or beneficial to the bona fide homesteader, but the question is whether the people who live in the towns and villages and cities of these western countries shall be permitted to nominally take up homesteads which they do not even pretend to be on for six or seven months of the year, and are not actually on except to go up there and look at it for a few months in the summer.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am sure the gentleman has gotten some misinformation.

Mr. MANN. I am sure that I have some real information.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no. There may some time have been a few such cases. We hear of those things here in Washington. Nobody ever hears of them in that country. They are about as unlike, absurd, and ridiculous as the representations of the wild and woolly West that we see in the eastern movies. Those things do not happen any more in our country.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; that is where I always heard of them. I have tramped a good deal over Colorado, and that is where I heard about these things, where everyone jests about it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That was many years ago. I hope you will come out there again.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, of what value is a homestead in one of these parks in which nobody can live for six or seven months of the year? What sort of a homestead is that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They make a good stock-raising homestead. There are hundreds of good stock ranches and homes now all through the North Park, the South Park, and the Middle Park of Colorado and hundreds of other smaller parks, notwithstanding they are very high and cold and the snow usually gets very deep in the wintertime and the summers are very short and cool.

Mr. GARD. Is there any stock raised up there, except polar bears?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir; and I want to tell this House that the cattle that are raised at from seven to ten thousand feet altitude tops the markets at Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, and Denver. They are the best stock in the world. The Whitefaces, the Herefords that we raise in Gunnison and several other counties in Colorado take the premium, the blue ribbons, on all the markets—raised at those altitudes and in that rigorous climate of the mountains.

Mr. GARD. Does this bill have for its purpose the bona fide establishment of homesteads or does it have for its purpose the fact that some one wants a summer home up in the mountains?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My dear sir, we Members from the West are not here encouraging fake homesteads nor pretended homesteads. We are trying to get sane, practical laws, to make it possible for people in good faith to make their permanent homes among us and help upbuild that great western empire. What the West needs is more people, more homes, more land under cultivation, more development of our boundless resources.

Mr. GARD. I am asking for information. I am in favor of anyone who wants to go into a new territory and establish a homestead.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the House would be more liberal to the homesteaders, and would pay a little attention to the recommendations and appeals of us people who live out there, we would have tens of thousands more homes in the West than we have at the present time. Eastern, narrow, impractical conservation can never develop the West. I have for 10 years been appealing to this House to cease treating the West as an unruly stepchild, and to stop useless and harassing restrictions and let us grow. We have not developed the way we should, and our principal obstacles have been the attitude of Congress and the narrow, technical spirit in which the public-land laws have been administered during the past 15 years. But notwithstanding these terrific handicaps against us I confidently believe that, considering our population, our very limited and meager means, our entire lack of Federal aid in cantonments, munitions plants, and other resources that were poured into the lap of the old and rich East, North, and South, that history will record that we of the arid West heroically rendered greater services and sacrifices than any other portion of our Republic.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide for leave of absence for homestead entrymen in one or two periods," approved August 22, 1914, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"That the entryman mentioned in section 2291 of Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of June 6, 1912, Thirty-seventh Statutes, 123, upon filing in the local land office notice of the beginning of such absence at his option shall be entitled to a leave of absence in one or two continuous periods, not exceeding in the aggregate five months in each year after establishing residence: Provided, That the register and receiver of the local land office under rules and regulations made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office may, upon proper showing, upon application of the homesteader, and only for climatic conditions, which makes residence on the homestead for seven months in each year a hardship, reduce the term of residence to not more than six months in each year, over a period of four years, or to not more than five months each year over a period of five years, but the total residence required shall in no event exceed 25 months, not less than 5 of which shall be in each year; proof to be made within five years after entry; and upon the termination of such absence, in each period, the entryman shall file a notice of such termination in the local land office; but in case of commutation the 14 months' actual residence, as now required by law, must be shown, and the person commuting be at the time a citizen of the United States."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

RESTORATION AND RESERVATION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10612) to restore to the public domain certain lands heretofore reserved for a bird reservation in Siskiyou and Modoc Counties, Cal., and Klamath County, Oreg., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so if the other Members of the House wish me to do so.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves about 54,000 acres of land that has been withdrawn for a bird reserve. Now, of that land 27,000 acres are in California and 27,000 acres in Oregon. The line goes through the center of the tract. Of those 27,000 acres in Oregon, about 20,000 is what is known as marsh land in private ownership; the other 7,000 is public land. Now, the 27,000 acres in Siskiyou County, Cal., is public land, except a small tract. The land is entirely agricultural land. The State of Oregon passed an act ceding this land to the Government of the United States. The State of California passed an act ceding the land to the Government. The Government accepted the cession, as will be found in the act on page 9 of the report. The Reclamation Service then withdrew the land from all entry under the first form of withdrawal. They proceeded to do work in connection with this to an extent of an expenditure of about $283,000. They then to some extent abandoned the work, and the land is still held and can not be disposed of. This is the only method by which the Government can have returned to it, and which will be returned to it, this $283,000, and at the same time the land will be open for homesteads after an examination is made by the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. When this bill was formerly on the Unanimous Consent Calendar I then directed attention to the section to which I had most objection; that is, section 5——

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Granting a preferential right of entry to members of a voluntary association entering upon this land. It has been called to my attention that persons connected with the association were soliciting membership at a certain fixed amount, under the promise that they would be entitled to preferential homestead entry.

Mr. RAKER. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. STAFFORD. I saw the letter myself which justifies the assertion.

Mr. RAKER. I saw the same letter and got the correspondence and the party asked what the expense would be that had been occasioned by virtue of obtaining the contract for various work done there so as to make this land susceptible of use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman believe it is a good practice to allow a voluntary association of men to form themselves together so as to allow those men, and those men alone, to be given preferential entry on some Government land that is opened to public entry?

Mr. RAKER. That does not apply in the condition as presented. The land would have been none of it used. Now, after this was done—I hope the House will hear me just a moment—while the land had been ceded to the Government and had been accepted and had been withdrawn from all form of entry by the department, the railroad came along and wanted to build across this land, and they were given the right to build across the land on condition that they would build a dike and embankment and opening over the river, so if the department saw fit it might place in gates. That was done, and instead of the land being not susceptible to agriculture, as reported heretofore, it turns out to be some of the most valuable land in the country. The evidence has all been presented showing that fact. Now, we reserved enough land for the bird reserve. The matter has been taken up fully with the Biological Survey and the Department of the Interior and the General Land Office, and this bill protects all the land and all the water front so that the birds may be protected.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it does not protect the public, and that is the trouble with it, that it does not give the public an equal right to make entry upon that land.

Mr. RAKER. Now, the gentleman makes that statement, but in all due deference to the gentleman I must respectfully say, and kindly, that he is entirely mistaken. The facts are that the public will lose the money that has been expended and the land will lie there idle unless legislation be enacted for its use. The Secretary of the Interior has reported favorably on the bill repeatedly, and the Secretary of Agriculture has reported favorably on the bill and the contract which is in this report made by the Water Users' Association of Oregon with the marsh owners of the land there was made pending this legislation, and by reason of this association getting every man together and having these owners surrounding the land waive their riparian rights; otherwise this entire tract of 54,000 acres of land would lie covered with water, unused except for a pelican pond and shitepokes and blue cranes, instead of a place where men could go and produce something for this country. Now, that contract was entered into——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill remain on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

PERSONNEL OF THE COAST GUARD.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6979) to regulate the personnel of the Coast Guard.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill has already been provided for in the naval appropriation act, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the bill goes off the calendar.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

METALLIFEROUS MINERALS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 385) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, this is an old friend. I do not know how many times we have objected to it.

Mr. HAYDEN. This bill is the same measure that passed the House by unanimous consent in the last Congress with certain amendments adopted by the Senate in the present Congress. It has passed the Senate and is now before the House.

Mr. MANN. I think it had better go over.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been on the calendar of the House since the 1st day of last July. It is made up of applicable sections taken from the water-power bill and the oil-leasing bill, which have passed the House three times. Every provision has been thoroughly discussed by the House. I am very anxious, indeed, to have it pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill goes from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

OLD CUSTOMHOUSE AT KENNEBUNK PORT, ME.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4283) authorizing the donation of the land and building at Kennebunk Port, Me., known as "the old customhouse," to the town of Kennebunk Port, Me.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] objects.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objects, and the bill goes off the calendar.

COMMITTEE FOR RELIEF IN THE NEAR EAST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12635) to incorporate the American committee for relief in the Near East.

The SPEAKER. Was not that bill passed in the House?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, the bill for this incorporation was submitted quite recently upon a request for unanimous consent and was objected to, and the bill is now before the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives, with a hearing arranged in subcommittee for tomorrow morning. I therefore object to the present consideration of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

LOCK AND DAM IN OLD RIVER, TEX.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7362) to authorize construction of a lock and dam in Old River, in the State of Texas, and the making of improvements enabling the passage of fresh water from a portion of Trinity River, above the mouth of Old River, into Old River above such lock and dam, and for the protection of rice crops against salt water.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman inform the House if this contemplates creating a situation there where later it might require a Federal appropriation?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. The only purpose of this bill, I will state to the gentleman, is that this salt water backs up over these rice crops and destroys them——

Mr. WALSH. Utterly destroys them?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. But this permits the construction of a lock and dam, not to control the salt water, but to permit the fresh water to pursue its course?

Now, in the construction of this lock and dam and in the operation of them, will it in any way divert or hold back this fresh water and create a condition there which ultimately will require a Federal appropriation?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, I think not. I would not be for it if I thought it did, and if that comes up I shall take the same position I take now.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman thinks the legislation is safeguarded in that respect?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted for the Old River irrigation district of Chambers County, of the State of Texas, and Old River Rice Irrigation Co., of Chambers County, of the State of Texas, or either of them, to construct a lock and dam in Old River at some suitable point, to be approved by the Secretary of War, and to make a cut or canal at the head of Pickett Bayou into Trinity River and dredge out and deepen the natural shoaled channel between Pickett Bayou and Old River, subject in each respect to the approval of the Secretary of War: Provided, That said lock and dam and other alterations shall be made and maintained wholly without expense to this Government and in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided, further, That no toll shall be imposed at any time for the passage of any craft through said lock or through said canals or cuts: And provided, further, That the operation and care of said lock and dam, with funds provided by the district, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be assigned to the Engineer officer of the United States Army in charge of the locality.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the privilege hereby granted shall be availed of within two years from the date hereof: Provided, That no dam constructed under the consent hereby granted shall be used to develop water power nor to generate electricity, but the use of all the improvements to be constructed shall be limited to irrigation.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "River," strike out the words "irrigation district of Chambers County, of the State of Texas, and Old River rice irrigation."

After the word "Company," in line 5, page 1, strike out the words "of Chambers County."

After the word "Texas," in line 6, on page 1, strike out the words "or either of them."

On page 2, line 6, strike out, at the beginning of the line, the word "and," and after the word "maintained," insert the words "and operated."

And at the end of line 6, page 2, strike out the words "this Government," and insert the words "the United States."

Page 2, line 11, after the word "cuts," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL LINCOLN-DOUGLAS SANATORIUM, DENVER, COLO.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11368) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple to the National Lincoln-Douglas Sanatorium & Consumptive Hospital Association (Inc.), of Denver, Colo., for a certain described tract of land.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given, I raise the point of order that this is a private bill and should be on the Private Calendar. It is a bill providing for a grant of land to a private corporation, the same as a grant of land to a private individual.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, this bill was on the Private Calendar first, and by direction it was transferred to the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, inasmuch as it had to do with the transfer of public land.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there are any number of bills on the Private Calendar which provide for the grant of public land to private individuals. They are private in their character. This is a bill not to a municipality but to a private corporation. The mere fact that it is a corporation does not destroy the fact that it is a private bill. You can not make fish of one and flesh of another.

Mr. MANN. It was transferred to the Union Calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it was transferred, it was so transferred erroneously.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference whether it was transferred erroneously or not. The question is whether it was transferred by order of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the question is a question of order.

Mr. MANN. If it was done by order of the House, it does not make any difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does make a considerable difference.

Mr. MANN. This bill was reported December 12, 1918, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House and placed on the Private Calendar, No. 149. Subsequently it was transferred to the Union Calendar. I do not remember about it, but I take it it was by consent or order of the House; and if it was transferred by order of the House to the Union Calendar then it is in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; but I am now raising a question of order. The logic and position of the gentleman from Illinois is this, That if a bill is transferred from the Private Calendar to the Public Calendar, even erroneously, it is beyond the control of the Speaker to correct it, to assign it to the proper calendar. But supposing the bill had been transferred to the House Calendar, and the bill should have been on the Union Calendar, and when it was called to the attention of the Speaker that it was a bill that should properly be on the Union Calendar, does the gentleman mean to contend that even though it had been transferred from the Private Calendar to the House Calendar it would be beyond the right of the Speaker to refer it to the Union Calendar? I am raising the question of order that it is a Private Calendar bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not remember what the facts are, but if the House transferred it to the Union Calendar from the Private Calendar the Speaker has no more control over it than the gentleman from Wisconsin has.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. I do not remember a thing in the world about this reference, but the presumption is that what ought to have been done touching it was done. Without taking up the time of the House to look into it, the presumption is that the House transferred it, and if the House did transfer it the Speaker has no more right to change the reference than anybody else.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, that is the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to the bill going over for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that this bill go to the foot of the calendar without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 390) to establish the Grand Canyon National Park, in the State of Arizona.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very important bill. I may say to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] that I am in sympathy with the purpose of providing that the Grand Canyon public monument be converted into a national park. There are some provisions, however, in the bill that I wish to make special inquiry about. They relate specifically to the grant of authority to the Secretary of the Interior for a right of way for a railroad through the canyon. I question the propriety of granting to the Secretary of the Interior the right to mar the landscape of that grand canyon by granting a right of way to a railway company to enter the national park.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not believe that any Secretary of the Interior, whoever he might be, would ever do anything of that kind. On the other hand, the Grand Canyon ought to be accessible to the public. It can now be reached from the south by a branch line constructed by the Santa Fe Railroad Co. up to the rim of the canyon, but is not accessible from the north. It has been proposed for some time that a railroad be constructed from Utah to the north side, which would present possibly a more wonderful view than from the south side. If that is done, permission will have to be given by the Secretary of the Interior for the construction of a railroad to the canyon rim from that side. In that case the railroad would be within a mile or so from the canyon before the park limits are reached. Of course, the gentleman would want the canyon to be accessible from every possible point to the people of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman does not think that it would be within the realm of possibility, or—I would not put it that strong—of probability for a railroad to go into the canyon proper and mar the scenic beautics of the canyon?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is impossible to construct a railroad into the canyon on account of the sheer drop of the walls on each side.

Mr. STAFFORD. The only point would be to grant permission to a railroad to reach the rim of the canyon?

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire further as to the need of granting authority for irrigation and reclamation projects, such as is conferred by this bill in the canyon proper.

Mr. HAYDEN. The provision contained in the bill would authorize the Secretary of the Interior, when consistent with the primary purposes of the park—that is, not to impair its scenic beauty—to allow storage reservoirs to be constructed for conserving the water of the Colorado River for irrigation purposes. I understand that there are in the canyon a number of reservoir sites where it is proposed in time to come, when full utilization is made of that stream, to build reservoirs for the storage of water. If that can be done without disturbing the primary purpose of the park, there is authority in this bill to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to a provision in this bill limiting the amount of the appropriation that may be passed by Congress for the maintenance, supervision, or improvement of the park?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that such a limitation exists only as to one national park, and a strenuous effort is being made at the present time to remove that very limitation. I do not see why the Grand Canyon should be discriminated against, when all save one other park are without limitations as to the amount of appropriations. I think that matter can very safely be left in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations from year to year. They will have before them the amount of the receipts from the park, and can, in view of the receipts, provide whatever is necessary. I myself could not suggest what a reasonable limit would be, because I do not know what the probable receipts from this park would be. As I say, I do not see why Congress should discriminate against this park, which is one of the great wonders of the world, more than equal to the Yosemite, the Glacier Park, or any other.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, my information is that all the receipts arising out of the use of national parks are used by the park authorities for public improvements in the parks.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was formerly true; but by a provision contained in a recent appropriation act it was provided that all such receipts shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The gentleman from Wisconsin will note that in section 3 of this bill as it passed the Senate provision is made—

SEC. 3. That the proceeds of leases and other revenues that may be derived from any source connected with said park shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the administration, maintenance, and improvement of the park.

But the House Committee on the Public Lands deliberately struck out that provision, so that this park will be like all other parks in that the receipts derived from it will be covered into the Treasury, and any future appropriation for this park will be subject to the scrutiny of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is one provision here which deserves the serious consideration of the House before we create a national park of this great wonderland, and that is the provision permitting the county of Coconino to continue to levy and collect tolls over the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail. I question seriously whether we should create a national park subject to the right of a county government to levy any tolls that it may see fit to impose upon all who may wish to see the beauties of that park.

Mr. HAYDEN. But the gentleman will concede that it is beyond the power of Congress to destroy any property rights which the county of Coconino now possesses.

Mr. STAFFORD. I fully agree to that, and I think there ought to be some provision whereby the Government could take over such private rights, so that the travel there would be free from the imposition of any unreasonable tolls.

Mr. HAYDEN. The bill provides, in lines 19 to 23, on page 8:

And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to negotiate with the said county of Coconino for the purchase of said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail and all rights therein, and report to Congress at as early a date as possible the terms upon which the property can be procured.

If this bill passes the Secretary will undoubtedly do that. He will come to Congress next year and say, "For a certain sum of money we can acquire this property." If that sum is not satisfactory, I will join the gentleman in authorizing condemnation proceedings to take it over.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish I were to be here to join with the gentleman in that, but unfortunately I shall not be here to aid the gentleman in that commendable effort.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no doubt but that the county and the Secretary can come to an amicable agreement. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that all the trails and roads in the park should be under Government control.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know what is the probable disposition of the authorities of the county of Coconino toward retaining the absolute right that they now possess to levy tolls upon those who use this, the only trail which can be used by those who desire to see the canyon?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will tell the gentleman all I know about that, very briefly. The Bright Angel trail was originally constructed by a private individual. After some years the county sued the individual, alleging that his right to operate the trail and collect the tolls had ceased. The county won the suit. It now maintains and operates the trail and collects the tolls. That is the situation at the present time. I imagine the county authorities would be glad enough to dispose of this trail at any figure which would pay no more than the fair value of the property.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any assurances that they will be willing to transfer to the National Government their rights to this Bright Angel trail?

Mr. HAYDEN. Knowing the supervisors of that county as I do, I think it is safe to say that they have no desire to compel the Government to pay any unreasonable amount; but if they do attempt it I shall do my best to see that authority is granted to the Secretary of the Interior to condemn and take over their rights.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is my most serious objection to the bill, and upon the promise of the gentleman to continue his best efforts in the future, when I will be in some other place outside of this Chamber, I will withdraw any objection that I have to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to say to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] that unquestionably the Grand Canyon of Arizona, which is one of the greatest wonders of the world, should be a national park, but as I take it, one of the objects of this bill is to make it accessible to the people.

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the gentleman why it is that ever since our railroads have been under the control of the Government, and especially in the past few months, the Grand Canyon has been made practically inaccessible to the American people who are traveling back and forth across the continent? As I understand it, the Railroad Administration has issued regulations preventing people from visiting the Grand Canyon, except to a limited number of tickets. What is the object of the Railroad Administration in doing that?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no knowledge on that subject, and no complaint has been made to me that any such thing was being done.

Mr. ANTHONY. Complaint has been made by people who are interested in the development of the Grand Canyon, and I was unable to offer any excuse for the curtailment of such privileges, and it would seem to me that people of Arizona should take notice of that action of the Railroad Administration.

Mr. HAYDEN. This is the first intimation that I have had of any such thing, and I shall certainly make inquiry of the Railroad Administration in regard to the matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or disposal under the laws of the United States and dedicated and set apart as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, under the name of the "Grand Canyon National Park," the tract of land in the State of Arizona particularly described by and included within metes and bounds as follows, to wit:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAKER). The question is on the committee amendments en gross, if there is no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire from some one, if I may, whether it is thought to be wise to permit the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to grant easements or rights of way for railroads on or across the park? It seems to me that is giving pretty wide discretion to the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question was raised before, and if there is any objection the Chair will have the vote on the amendments separately.

Mr. MADDEN. There is going to be objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "road" insert ", passing and in relation to United States Geological Survey bench marks stamped 'Canyon' and numbered 6340, 6235, 6372, 6412, 6302, 6144, and 6129."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "Canyon," insert "crossing Hualapai Canyon and continuing northwesterly along said upper rim."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 11, after the word "sections," strike out "3, 4, 9, and 10" and insert "2, 3, 10, and 11."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, strike out all of lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, being section 3, and insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect the rights of the Havasupai Tribe of Indians to the use and occupancy of the bottom lands of the Canyon of Cataract Creek as described in the Executive order of March 31, 1882, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to permit individual members of said tribe to use and occupy other tracts of land within said park for agricultural purposes."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question in reference to section 2. Beginning on line 16, page 7, we find the proviso:

Provided, That all concessions for hotels, camps, transportation, and other privileges of every kind and nature for the accommodation or entertainment of visitors shall be let at public bidding to the best and most responsible bidder.

I take it that is not the provision appearing in the general act regarding national parks, above referred to, in the same section; that this is a special item for this particular canyon in establishing it as a national park. The inquiry that came to me is this: I would like to ask the gentleman about whether or not selling those privileges to the highest bidder at auction does not open up the possibility of abuse so far as charges that may be made the public are concerned? I have visited the canyon, as many of us, of course, have, and have greatly enjoyed its beautiful natural wonders. It seems to me we ought to do everything possible to protect the public in not being excessively charged for the privileges of the canyon. If a contractor bids high for the privilege of the various concessions, he must naturally make his rates to his patrons in proportion.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will read the proviso again, he will see that it does not say that the contract shall be let to the higest bidder but to the best and most responsible bidder.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is true; but you are aiming to get the highest price possible from the bidder. If two men of equal responsibility are bidding, the one who bids the highest would get the contract, and you are not protecting the patrons of the park in respect to the rates that the successful bidder shall be allowed to charge for any of the sight-seeing privileges. It seems to me you are establishing a monopoly there, simply from the fact that you want to get all you can for the Government. Of course the Government does not desire to commercialize the canyon.

Mr. HAYDEN. My recollection is that, when this legislation was reported from the Senate committee, it provided that concessions should be let to the highest bidder, and the Senate changed it to the best and most responsible bidder.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is a good change.

Mr. HAYDEN. Leaving it in the discretion of the National Park Service to decide which bidder is the best and most responsible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition. The National Park Service will be able to give the public better accommodations by having the best and most responsible bidder render the service rather than the highest bidder.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me ask the gentleman this: In the other national parks that arrange for sight-seers what is the method of allowing private enterprise to sell privileges or take people around or entertain them at the hotels and that sort of thing; in other words, what is the occasion of putting in the proviso at all if the park is to be under the government of a commission or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not think that this proviso adds to or takes away in the least from the authority that the National Park Service has over other parks. If they decide at the Glacier National Park, for instance, that to grant a large hotel concession to one person would insure better accommodations for the public than by allowing several smaller hotels to be built, they have authority to do so, and they do. Upon the contrary, if they believe that better service can be rendered through three or four hotel concessions, they have authority to issue any number of permits. This proviso is unnecessary in one way, because it adds to or takes away no authority that the National Park Service now has. It is a mere reiteration of permission to do what they now have authority to do.

Mr. TREADWAY. It does do this without question: It enables them to obtain the highest possible price from responsible people——

Mr. HAYDEN. No; it does not.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, the high man, in the natural course of things, must get his money back.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am sure that if the gentleman will again read this proviso he will see that there is nothing in it which compels the National Park Service to accept the highest bid or which would induce the bidder to offer a higher rate than otherwise. The question is whether he is the best and most responsible bidder. Now, the best bidder is the man who can render the best service to the public. His responsibility is dependent upon his financial ability to carry out any agreement he might make. There is nothing in this proviso which compels a high bid. If it said "the highest bidder," as was the language originally reported to the Senate, it would do that, but the Senate deliberately struck out the term "highest bidder" and said "best and most responsible," believing that change to be in the interest of the public.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. TILSON. If that is the intention, does it not seem that there ought to be language placed in the proviso that would state what is the ground for determining the best bidder?

Mr. HAYDEN. Well, the best bidder at one place might not be the best at another. We must not take away the discretion of the National Park Service.

Mr. TILSON. In the gentleman's opinion, if one man offered $1,000 and another man $500 for the privilege, the $1,000 man might be turned down, and the $500 man accepted because he would agree to make more reasonable concessions——

Mr. HAYDEN. To the public; yes.

Mr. TILSON. That would be the policy?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the policy with the other national parks?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. There have been many complaints by men saying, "I will bid twice as much if you will give a certain concession to me." The National Park Service has replied, "No; the present concessionaire is rendering splendid service and affording proper accommodations for the public. There is not room in this place for two of you in the same line of business, and we will not displace one who is treating the public fairly."

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask if that condition to which the chairman refers is provided for in the general act, namely, the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a national park service, and for other purposes," why have this proviso in the bill at all? Why not let this park take its place in exactly the same way as all the other national parks do under that act?

Mr. HAYDEN. As I stated to the gentleman, that is exactly what this proviso does.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. HAYDEN. My only objection to striking it out is that I want as little difference as possible with the Senate.

Mr. TREADWAY. I see the gentleman's attitude, and it does strike me I can not see personally any reason why this particular park should have a different condition to be carried out than the other national parks where this service is being performed.

Mr. HAYDEN. This proviso merely states that the national park service may do at this park what they are doing at all the other national parks at the present time. It does not place the Grand Canyon Park in any different status.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not think it will make any trouble in securing an agreement with the Senate conferees——

Mr. HAYDEN. But I do not want the bill to go to conference if I can avoid it.

Mr. TREADWAY. If it is only to go to conference as to this one amendment, I shall not insist on it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have been told by gentlemen interested in this bill in another body that they would agree to all of the House committee amendments. I have not talked with them about the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that is my objection to having it go in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, after line 4, insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and upon such conditions as he may deem proper, grant easements or rights of way for railroads upon or across the park."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, just a moment; I would like to know why the Secretary of the Interior is granted this wide discretion? Why can not it be possible for the House and the Senate to determine that question when it shall arise?

Mr. HAYDEN. The idea embodied in the provision to which the gentleman from Illinois refers was taken from the act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park, approved January 26, 1915, which reads as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and upon such conditions as he may deem wise, grant easements or rights of way for steam, electric, or similar transportation upon or across the park.

I will state to the gentleman the prospects so far as any railroad construction in Grand Canyon National Park is concerned. There is now a Santa Fe branch line which enters the edge of the proposed park from the south, and it is very desirable that a railroad be built into this new park from the north, so people can conveniently arrive on the other side of the canyon to view it from that angle.

There is a considerable body of timber in the Kaibab National Forest, to the north of the Grand Canyon. There have been tentative offers to purchase this timber from the Forest Service at different times. If that timber could be sold it would induce the construction of a railroad, combined with the possibility of carrying tourists to and from this park. And, of course, we are all anxious to have as many people visit the Grand Canyon as possible. This park will be under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. No Secretary of the Interior would think of permitting any railroad to be constructed that would in any way injure the scenic beauties of the Grand Canyon, but, on the other hand, he would undoubtedly favor the construction of railroads for the convenience of the public. He has now the right to grant rights of way on the public domain. The Committee on the Public Lands thought it would be entirely proper to give him the same authority within this park.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not see any reason why we should grant him authority to authorize the construction of railroads. Why should we not reserve that authority to ourselves?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman can conceive of any injury to the public by granting him this authority——

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody ever can tell. What we can tell is that we relinquish jurisdiction of it, and we are placing it in the hands of one man, who does not have to consult anybody.

Mr. HAYDEN. We are placing the administration of the whole park in his hands.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that. We are placing the management in his hands, and that is a perfectly proper thing to do. When it comes to the question of authorizing the granting of a franchise, or for the Secretary of the Interior to permit a railroad to be constructed somewhere, that is quite a different proposition. It seems to me the people's representatives ought to reserve some of the legislation to themselves and act upon the merits of the case when it comes up.

Mr. HAYDEN. If I had the least doubt in the world that any Secretary of the Interior would permit the scenery of that canyon to be destroyed by a railroad, I would be the first to object.

Mr. MADDEN. It is a question of granting blank authority to an individual to do something which belongs to the Congress of the United States to do.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Congress of the United States used to insist that its consent be obtained every time a railroad was to be built across an Indian reservation, and other important public business was delayed many times to pass such bills. But finally Congress decided to turn over all such matters to the Secretary of the Interior, who looks after the welfare of the Indians and guards their rights. We now propose to place the administration of this park in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, directing him to take care of it and to make it accessible to the public. If there should be an opportunity to build a railroad in order to make it possible for more people to look at the wonders and the glories of the Grand Canyon, we should give the Secretary authority to grant the necessary rights of way. It is exactly in line with his other duties in connection with the proper administration of the park.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that so far as the park is concerned that may be true, but this does not confine the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to granting the right of a railway to be constructed up to the park in order that people may be able to see it. It gives him the right to grant any easements or rights of way on or across the park; that is, to go any place.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman has been to the Grand Canyon, he knows a railroad can not get very far beyond the rim of it.

Mr. MADDEN. It would go across the public domain. And why should we want to give other authority if he has authority now?

Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the amendment out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAKER). The question before the House is the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 18, noes 7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the country to the fact that we have 25 Members present when an important bill is under consideration to give the Secretary of the Interior absolute control over public lands and to give him the right to grant anything he wants to a railroad.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 9. The Executive order of January 11, 1908, creating the Grand Canyon National Monument, is hereby revoked and repealed, and such parts of the Grand Canyon National Game Preserve designated under authority of the act of Congress approved June 29, 1906, entitled 'An act for the protection of wild animals in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve,' as are by this act included with the Grand Canyon National Park are hereby excluded and eliminated from said game preserve."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know what the Executive order is that is repealed.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will look at the report of the Committee on the Public Lands he will see that all the Executive orders are printed in full.

Mr. MADDEN. We do not have an opportunity to read them when they are brought up here quickly.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Executive order of January 11, 1908, creating the Grand Canyon National Monument, was signed by President Roosevelt under authority of the national-monument act, reserving the land now included in this park as a national monument. That was no doubt a very wise act on his part, but now the time has come when this area should be changed from a monument to a park, in conformity with the new policy of Congress. The Grand Canyon game preserve was likewise created to cover a considerable area of the same country. The reserve itself, outside the park, will not be disturbed by the passage of this bill, but the area to be included within the national park is excluded from the game-preserve park, for the reason that the game preserve is administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, while the park is administered by the Secretary of the Interior. We thus avoid a conflict of jurisdiction between the two Secretaries.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, for example, I have a farm and there is some game during some parts of the year on that farm, and that farm is supposed to be managed by me or somebody for me. Yet the game laws apply to the farm.

Is there any more reason why the law should be repealed as to the land that is controlled by the Secretary of the Interior than there is that the law should be repealed as to land that is controlled by some individual that owns the title to it? It seems to me that the game laws should remain intact, regardless of whether the land is under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture or anybody else.

Mr. HAYDEN. As I said before, the game preserve outside of the national park is not disturbed. The National Park Service act forbids the killing of all game in the national parks. Its provisions are just as stringent as the national game-preserve law.

Mr. MADDEN. We ought not to repeal any of the laws that we have.

Mr. HAYDEN. This provision of the bill is to avoid duplication of administration over the same area of land.

Mr. MADDEN. I must protest against the repeal of this section of the game law for any such reason as the gentleman from Arizona gives.

Mr. HAYDEN. If this section is not enacted, we will have one proclamation creating a game preserve and another proclamation creating a national monument and still another act creating a national park, all superimposed on the same territory. I am trying to eliminate the previous withdrawals covering the area described in this bill, so that it will be nothing but a national park under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. The Grand Canyon should be on the same footing as any other national park, with all of these previous incumbrances removed. They were very proper in their time, but their usefulness has passed when Congress makes this a national park.

Mr. MADDEN. But there are two propositions here. One is to repeal that section of the Executive order which provides for a national monument and another is to repeal that section of an Executive order which provides for a game preserve in the park. They are two different propositions entirely. I am entirely willing, and I think it may be wise, to repeal that section of the Executive order which provides for a national monument, because we are already providing for the national monument when we are organizing the park. I do not think it is wise to repeal the game-law section.

Mr. HAYDEN. The minute the game-preserve law is repealed the provisions of the National Park Service law, the general law covering all national parks, comes into effect, and that law provides that no game shall be hunted or killed in any national park. All the game will be fully protected, just as it is in the Yosemite Valley, the Yellowstone, or any other national park in the United States. I simply desire to have but one law in effect directing that no game shall be killed in this park. It is neither necessary nor wise to have one law under the administration of the Secretary of the Interior and another law under the administration of the Secretary of Agriculture to accomplish the single purpose of protecting the game within the Grand Canyon National Park.

Mr. MADDEN. There would be no sense in putting it under two jurisdictions.

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly. That is all I seek to avoid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] some questions about this bill. There is a tribe of Indians in this park called the Hopi Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. No. The Havasupai Indians live in Cataract Canyon.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They are covered by section 3 of the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I observe in section 4 that it is the purpose to purchase from the county in which this park is located, the county of Coconino, the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It occurred to me that perhaps, in view of the fact that this was being made into a national park, some arrangement would be made by which the county would contribute this trail gratuitously.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is shown in the report that in the last five years Coconino County had receipts of about $20,000 from the Bright Angel Trail and expenditures of about $10.000. That is, the income each year is about $4,000 and the outgo about $2,000. The county makes a profit of about $2,000 a year out of the trail, so that if it was condemned they could not get a very large sum for it. The county acquired this trail as the result of litigation about five years and has obtained the revenue from it since that time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is this trail managed entirely by the county or is it managed by the hotel companies?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is managed by the county. The county appoints a caretaker, whose duty it is to see that the trail is kept in good condition and that the revenues are collected. He receives about $4,000 and spends about $2,000. He turns over about $2,000 to the county.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Section 8 of the bill provides that "where privately owned lands within the said park lie within 300 feet of the rim of the Grand Canyon no building, tent, fence, or other structure shall be erected on the park lands lying between said privately owned land and the rim." I presume that this is to protect the hotel company or anyone owning the land from the liability of anyone getting in front of the hotel company?

Mr. HAYDEN. This was done at the request of the owner of the Grand View Hotel. He thought that he controlled the rim of the canyon, but when a survey was made it was found that there was a strip of about 150 feet wide between his land and the rim. He feared that some structure might be put up which would obstruct the view from the hotel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All this discussion is by unanimous consent and out of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. I would be glad to give all the information to the gentleman from Illinois that I can.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair knows; but the question is on the passage of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] can proceed for five minutes if he gets unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understood, Mr. Speaker, I had the right to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not without the consent of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. The previous question has not been ordered, Mr. Speaker, on the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to be heard?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman how much of this land is privately owned? What I am trying to get at is whether this section will create a monopoly in any set of individuals to control the rim of that canyon.

Mr. HAYDEN. No. If you will notice on page 7 of the report on this bill, there are 613,120 acres of land within the park, and only 391 acres are privately owned.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Do you know how much land there is between the El Tovar Hotel and Grand View that is privately owned?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no privately owned land on the rim between El Tovar and Grand View. I do not know of any private holdings on the rim east of El Tovar, except the Grand View property itself, and a small acreage that belongs to Mr. Martin Buggelin. Those are the only places, so far as I know, along the whole rim for miles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WATER SUPPLIES OF OREGON CITY, DALLAS, AND CORVALLIS, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12770) to reserve as part of the Oregon and Siuslaw National Forests in Oregon certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. against the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there are on the calendar two bills of similar import, providing for the purchase of land by the municipalities themselves needed for the protection of the water supply of the municipalities referred to in those bills. This bill seeks to have that burden thrown upon the National Government by transferring the land and making it a part of the forest reserve. I wish the gentleman would explain the reason why in some instances the municipalities are willing to purchase this land for the protection of their own water supply and in other instances you want to throw the burden on the National Government.

Mr. HAWLEY. The distinction between this bill and the two that follow is this: The one immediately following, for the city of Myrtle Point, Oreg., relates to a very small acreage of land, which is mostly agricultural in character and is to be purchased from the Government at $2.50 an acre under terms similar to those provided in the Oregon & California land-grant act, just as private individuals can purchase it. The one following that, for the city of McMinnville, is practically on the same basis. The land is mostly agricultural, covered over with small growths. The city will be authorized to purchase the land and acquire title by paying $2.50 an acre for the agricultural land and for whatever timber may be on any of it at the appraised price. But the gentleman has undoubtedly read the report on the bill which we are now considering, and knows that, with the amount of timber on the lands described in this bill, it would be impossible for the city at the present time to buy the lands. They are unable now to provide the money. This transfers these lands to the national forests, so that their water supply will not be diminished. The land still remains under the control of Congress. The city of Corvallis is the site of the Oregon State Agricultural College, which has from 2,000 to 2,500 students every year. The water supply for the city and the college comes from sources about 12 miles away, on the western side of Mount Chintimini. If the lands which it is proposed to transfer to the national forest are cut over, the streams that supply the city and the college with water for domestic purposes will dry up, and the city has no other sources of supply from which to obtain mountain water fresh and clean for its population and for the agricultural college.

Mr. STAFFORD. How far distant are these lands from the respective forest reserves? Are they contiguous to the forest reserves?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; they are not contiguous to the forest reserves. The area is for the protection of the water supply of the city of Corvallis and is about 1,400 acres. The agricultural college there maintains a school of forestry. The superintendent of that school, Prof. Peavey, was formerly in the Forest Service. If this land is transferred, he, with the college and the city authorities, will undertake the supervision of it under the direction of the Forest Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. On the pay roll of the Government of the United States?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; on their own pay roll. He will use it for the study of forestry and of forest protection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has there been any tentative agreement embodying that idea?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I do not think the Forest Service and the school have entered into any formal agreement, but they have told me that that is the intention.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who told you?

Mr. HAWLEY. Prof. Peavey and the water commissioners, who have taken up the question with the school authorities.

Mr. STAFFORD. They have expressed their willingness as to this land, distant 8 and 11 miles from the nearest border of the existing Siuslaw National Park, to undertake supervision of it without charge to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. They have been policing it already in order to prevent fires breaking out which would destroy their water supply, and they will continue to do that under an arrangement with the city.

The larger portion of this land becomes a part of the Oregon National Forest for the protection of the water supply of Oregon City. This bill is based on a precedent by which a much larger area of land was transferred to the Oregon National Forest in order to protect the water supply of the city of Portland. That bill has already been passed by the House and Senate and has become a law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GARD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to inquire about this land. As I understand, these lands were to be paid to the railroad company at the rate of $2.50 an acre?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I call to mind the fact that the Government paid back taxes to these counties. Now, what becomes of that money that the Government has paid in back taxes? Suppose you sell it to these people for $2.50 an acre. As I understand, the Government will be out all the taxes that it has paid.

Mr. HAWLEY. These small areas will become a part of the national forests and still be the property of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman think it is right for the State of Oregon to get all the money?

Mr. SINNOTT. The Government is not out anything for the taxes. The Government is reimbursed for any taxes it may pay out of the sale of the land.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Government will not lose any taxes which it has paid, because the sale of the entire acreage will reimburse the Government for all moneys paid the railroad company for taxes paid to the counties, as well as for all other expenses incurred and will leave a goodly sum in the possession of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. At $2.50 an acre?

Mr. HAWLEY. The sale of the timber and the land will yield a net return to the Government of a considerable sum of money.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, well, the Government sells for $2.50 an acre. They pay the railroad $2.50 an acre. Where does the Government come in, where does it get out of it with the back taxes?

Mr. HAWLEY. The Government recovers the money that it pays to the railroad and for the accrued taxes through the sale of the entire tract, which covers many thousands of acres and hundreds of millions of feet of timber.

Mr. FOSTER. The State in which the land is located got practically all of the money, the Government paid the advances, and the Government got but little, as we all know.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. After the Government has paid $2.50 to the railroad company and then sells the land for $2.50 and they have had to pay all of the taxes that have accumulated for years, I can not get it through my head where the Government comes out.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is referring to some particular acreage and not to the general tract?

Mr. FOSTER. I am referring to this particular tract or any other that may come in under the same conditions.

Mr. HAWLEY. Take the lands in Benton County. There are many thousands of acres of the O. & C. land. On its recapture by the Government, the Government is to pay $2.50 to the railroad company and back taxes to the county; and when it sells that land and the timber it will get a great deal more than it will have paid to the railroad company and the county in back taxes, and will have a large profit left for itself.

Mr. FOSTER. But the Government practically gets nothing.

Mr. HAWLEY. I again beg to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. In a bill that was passed we tried to get the Government something, but could not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I still reserve the right to object.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman will remember that the Government gets 10 per cent, and in addition to that amount a further 40 per cent for the reclamation fund. The Government gets half of the proceeds obtained from the sale of these lands.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government put up all of the money to pay all of the back taxes and the expenses when they took back these lands. After dividing it and giving to the counties and the cities and anybody else out there that wanted anything, they then had the magnanimity to let the Government take 10 per cent.

Mr. HAWLEY. And 40 per cent that goes into the reclamation fund.

Mr. FOSTER. It all went to the benefit of the country out there.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not for the area in which these lands are, because there is no reclamation project in that section.

Mr. FOSTER. After you have given the railroad company $2.50 and sold the land for $2.50, how does the Government get anything?

Mr. MADDEN. The question is whether or not they will not sell them for more than $2.50.

Mr. FOSTER. But the bill provides for the sale of them at $2.50.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill provides that the Government shall sell the agricultural lands for $2.50, the timber at an appraised value, and then, after the timber is removed, it shall sell that land for $2.50. The Government will receive a large amount of money. The counties get 25 per cent, the State 25 per cent, the Government gets 40 per cent for its reclamation fund, and 10 per cent for the Treasury as the land is sold.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, the gentleman ought not to talk about the 40 per cent for the reclamation fund, because that is not for the benefit of the Federal Government, so far as going into the Treasury is concerned.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no reclamation project in any part of the land where the lands included in the bill are situated.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us understand it. Suppose, for example, the Government has already paid $2.50 an acre for the land it got from the railroad companies and then is required to sell the land for $2.50, then required to give 25 per cent to the county and 25 per cent to the State and take 40 per cent for the reclamation and 10 per cent for itself, how much will it have left?

Mr. HAWLEY. But the gentleman has left out the most valuable asset, namely, the timber. The value of the land itself is a comparatively small item. The great value is in the timber.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think we would better go into this a little bit more before we permit this to be passed. I ask unanimous consent that it go over until the next day for unanimous consent—to go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I gather from the statement of the gentleman that it is the purpose to put this land back into the control of the Government for the protection of cities, temporarily, until they can buy the land.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know that they will ever buy it. It is included in the forest reserves for the protection of the water supply at the cities. The Government can change by legislation that status at any time. It may be that later the cities will be in a position to purchase it. I said "temporarily," because it is not a final and absolute disposal of the land. Meanwhile the Government will own the land and timber. It still remains the property of the Government.

Mr. GARD. The purpose is to develop it for the cities, because the Government does not want to spend the required amount of money now?

Mr. HAWLEY. It puts these areas into the forests named for the protection of the water supply of these cities. It is legislation that Congress may change at any time, and if the Congress later on thinks the cities ought to buy it, when they are better able to do so, the Congress can deal with that alternative.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the water supply is vital?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. HAWLEY. The water supply is absolutely vital. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill remain on the calendar, to go to the foot thereof. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PURCHASE OF LAND BY CITY OF MYRTLE POINT, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13019) to authorize the purchase by the city of Myrtle Point, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over and go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not see why that should be done.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is going to be any controversy about it, I object to its consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will not the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I will not reserve it, because I have looked the matter over.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman not permit me to make a statement of two minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, I reserve my objection for that purpose.

Mr. HAWLEY. This bill provides for the purchase by the city of Myrtle Point, Oreg., of the land described in the bill. Under the act disposing of the Oregon & California grant the lands were to be sold for $2.50 an acre if classified as agricultural. The timber on the remainder was to be appraised and sold at the appraised price. Then when the timber was removed the land was to be sold at $2.50 an acre. All this bill does is to give to the city of Myrtle Point the right to buy as other purchasers can buy now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Buy the land and not the timber?

Mr. HAWLEY. Buy the land and timber. They will pay for both the land and the timber at the appraised price. It authorizes an immediate sale for this land and puts the money at once in the Treasury.

Mr. EMERSON. Why does the city have to have this privilege?

Mr. HAWLEY. Because the Oregon & California land-grant act provides that the land can be sold to individuals only.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the committee has amended the bill so that the city will be not only obliged to pay the appraised value of the timber, but also the value of the timberland at $2.50 an acre.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the bill was introduced the city was only obligated to pay $2.50 per acre for the classified agricultural land and the appraised value of the timber on the other land.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the committee thought it was advisable not only to have them pay $2.50 an acre for the classified agricultural land and the appraised value of the timber, but $2.50 per acre for the timberland in addition to the appraised value of the timber.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is right. He has stated the situation correctly.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill is entirely different from the previous bill——

Mr. HAWLEY. Entirely.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill not only gives protection to this city's water supply but also recoups the National Government by compelling the city to pay to the National Government——

Mr. HAWLEY. Just as much as any others would pay, and it makes an immediate sale. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe I shall object to this, although I want to say this land grant out in Oregon has been very unfair, it seems to me, to the Federal Government in all its transactions, and I think we ought to scrutinize very carefully any of these bills in reference——

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. FOSTER. I shall object if the gentleman is going to interrupt me—I say we ought to scrutinize these bills when they come here with a great deal of care. This bill, of course, is to protect the water supply of Myrtle Point. That is one of the determining factors in this legislation, and I shall not object to this and shall let it go.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Oregon if this bill carries a purchase price of $2.50 per acre? Is that right?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; that is for the land classified as agricultural, and that is the same price that it is now being sold for.

Mr. GARD. And also provides the appraised price for the timber?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; that is the same as the present law.

Mr. GARD. What is the authority for the appraisal of the timber at the present time?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is done by the Secretary of the Interior. The land, I think, has already been classified and the timber has been cruised and an appraised valuation set on it.

Mr. GARD. How much is that, does the gentleman know?

Mr. HAWLEY. That I do not know. It is in the hands of the Department of the Interior and they fix it at the current price in the locality.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman can not inform us how much the appraised price of the timber is where the land——

Mr. HAWLEY. I know the land is $2.50 an acre; that is fixed in the act.

Mr. GARD. For how many acres—a quarter of a section?

Mr. HAWLEY. It will be about 120 acres. It is sold to the city of Myrtle Point just as the Secretary would sell to a private individual. That is the change it makes in the law, that the city will be authorized to buy it just as a private individual can purchase it.

Mr. GARD. In the law in this bill and the succeeding one the changes are merely such as to permit the cities to buy so as to protect their water supply?

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GARD. I shall not object to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and is hereby, authorized to issue a patent to the city of Myrtle Point, Oreg., for the following described lands, being a part of the lands revested in the United States by the act of Congress enacted June 9, 1916 (39 Stat., p. 218), to wit: The southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 11, the east half of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 11, and the north half of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 13, all in township 29 south, range 12 west, of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Oregon; on condition that the said city shall pay to the United States, when said lands are subject to disposition under said act of revestment, the sum of $2.50 per acre for all of said lands that may be classified as agricultural, and the reasonable appraised price of the timber on all such lands as may be classified as timberlands.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe all necessary regulations to carry into effect the foregoing provisions of this act.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "the southeast quarter" and insert "south half."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, line 8, after the word "city," insert the word "first."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "that may be classified as agricultural."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, line 11, after the word "the," strike out the word "reasonable."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PURCHASE OF LANDS BY CITY OF M'MINNVILLE, OREG.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2784) to authorize the purchase by the city of McMinnville, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice in reading the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior the bill as it was originally reported contained even-numbered sections. Has that been corrected in the bill as it now stands?

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill as reported by the Committee on the Public Lands I am sure conforms to the recommendations of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman can not give any positive assurance whether only odd-numbered sections are included in the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there are no even-numbered sections included in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, and pursuing the same line of inquiry as the gentleman from Wisconsin, can the gentleman inform us whether, when this bill was presented, as it was, to the Secretary of the Interior, the Acting Secretary of the Interior found that certain lands were not in this Oregon & California Railroad grant and should not be included in the present bill? Does the bill rectify it?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I have scrutinized the bill a moment ago, and observed no even-numbered sections in the bill.

Mr. GARD. Would the gentleman mind passing it now, so that he can get the information? It would not be proper to include lands that were the property of the California & Oregon Railroad Co.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I can assure the gentleman now just as certainly as a little later that there are no even-numbered sections included in the bill as it was reported by the committee.

Mr. GARD. There is no amendment in the bill that I can see.

Mr. STAFFORD. Still under reservation of objection, am I to infer that the language of the Acting Secretary, directing attention to the fact that the bill then submitted to him contained even-numbered sections which were not in the grant of the Oregon & California Railroad grant, is covered by the following:

Your committee, however, is advised that all of said lands are included in existing homestead entries which have not yet passed to patent.

Mr. HAWLEY. That matter was very thoroughly investigated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office at my request. There was only one homestead entry in these lands which had not lapsed, and that was erroneously placed on an 80-acre tract alleged to be in an odd-numbered section, whereas it was really in an even-numbered section.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and is hereby, authorized to issue a patent to the city of McMinnville, Oreg., for the following-described lands, being a part of the land revested in the United States by the act of Congress enacted June 9, 1916 (39 Stats., p. 218), to wit: The north half of section 13, township 3 south, range 6 west; north half southeast quarter of section 13, township 3 south, range 6 west; north half southwest quarter of section 13 township 3 south, range 6 west; southeast quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west; southeast quarter southwest quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west; north half northeast quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west; northwest quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west; southeast quarter southeast quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west; northwest quarter southeast quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west; north half southwest quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west; southwest quarter southwest quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west; southwest quarter northwest quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west; on condition that the said city shall pay to the United States, when said lands are subject to disposition under said act of revestment, the sum of $2.50 per acre for all of said lands that may be classified as agricultural, and the reasonable appraised price of the timber on all such lands as may be classified as timberlands.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe all necessary regulations to carry into effect the foregoing provisions of this act.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Page 2, line 22, after the word "lands," strike out "that may be classified as agricultural."

Page 2, line 23, after the word "the" where it occurs the first time, strike out the word "reasonable."

Page 2, line 19, after the word "shall," insert the word "first."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LANDS IN SOUTH DAKOTA FOR CEMETERY PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12082) authorizing the sale of certain lands in South Dakota for cemetery purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, what is the special need of having this authorization when the department has authority to grant the right to certain classes of associations?

Mr. GANDY. The Secretary decided that under the construction of the act he did not have authority to sell for cemetery purposes, and I may say that was ascertained after that land had been, as it is now being, used for cemetery purposes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The land is now being used for cemetery purposes?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have the bill considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and convey to the White River Cemetery Co., for cemetery purposes, for a price not less than the appraised value thereof, a 10-acre tract within the former Rosebud Indian Reservation in Mellette County, S. Dak., described as the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 34, township 42 north, range 29 west, sixth principal meridian, or such part thereof as may be required: Provided, however, That the tract conveyed shall be described in terms of the legal survey, the consideration to be paid to the superintendent of the Rosebud Reservation, to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Rosebud Indians.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GANDY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, CHAMBERLAIN, S. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13004) extending the time for commencing construction of bridge and for maintenance of pontoon and pile bridge by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. across the Missouri River at or near Chamberlain, S. Dak., and providing additional requirements for bridge to be constructed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I recall when the original bill, which this bill seeks to amend, was under consideration, I recall the attempt that was made to force the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. to build a bridge across the Missouri River at Chamberlain. Now, I understand that the work has not been performed, because of conditions arising during the war. This bill seeks to extend the time in which that work may be undertaken and completed.

Mr. GANDY. I may say to the gentleman that the company tried to comply with the act of April 28, 1916, but the division of capital expenditures of the Railroad Administration declined to approve the expenditure of as much money as that would entail, and the War Industries Board refused to permit the company to purchase the steel that was necessary for it. In its effort to remedy the situation, which called forth the act of April 28, 1916, the railroad company purchased two second-hand steel spans that were taken out at Kansas City, where a double-track bridge took the place of a single-track bridge. These spans are each 300 feet in length, and with the 200-foot pontoon draw makes 800 feet of clearance across the channel. They are at this time erecting those two steel spans and putting in the new pontoon draw.

Mr. STAFFORD. The work, then, is really beginning under the new authorization?

Mr. GANDY. They had to begin it because the flood took the old bridge all out.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, before Congress passed the bill they declined to put in a permanent structure, but awaited the subsiding of the freshet each year, and put in a pontoon?

Mr. GANDY. Yes. This measure has the approval of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department and the Federal manager of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, and it carries the provision that if the construction that is contemplated under this bill is not sufficient to provide for continuous railroad traffic, the Secretary of War may order such changes or additions as are necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then section 3, found on page 2, lines 17 to 23, is merely authorization to continue the present temporary bridge, and has no reference whatsoever to this bridge with the long span?

Mr. GANDY. Section 3 has no reference to that. Section 2 has reference to work that is now being done there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for commencing the construction of the bridge authorized by section 1 of the act of Congress approved April 28, 1916, is hereby extended one year, or until April 28, 1919

SEC. 3. That if the new bridge built under the provisions of said act shall be found, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, to be so constructed that it does not reasonably meet the requirements for continuous railroad traffic, then and in such event the Secretary of War may order such changes made as in his judgment may be necessary to make said bridge meet the reasonable requirements for uninterrupted railroad traffic; all the privileges herein conferred and the right to maintain any bridge built hereunder shall cease and determine unless such changes as the Secretary of War shall direct shall be commenced within six months and complete within two years next following such notice.

SEC. 2. That the time during which the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. was authorized to maintain its pontoon and pile bridge across the Missouri River at or near Chamberlain, S. Dak., by section 2 of the said act of April 28, 1916, is hereby extended for one year from date of approval hereof.

With committee amendments as follows:

Line 3, page 1, after the word "commencing" insert "and completing," and change the word "time" to "times."

Line 6, page 1, strike out the word "is" and insert the word "are."

Line 6, page 1, commencing with and including the word "one," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof "two and five years, respectively, from April 28, 1917."

Line 3, page 2, strike out the word "new."

Line 7, page 2, after the word "continuous," insert the words "and uninterrupted."

Line 7, page 2, strike out the words "the Secretary of War" and insert in lieu thereof "he."

Line 8, page 2, strike out the word "made."

Line 9, page 2, strike out the words "the reasonable" and insert in lieu thereof the word "such."

Line 10, page 2, after the word "requirements" insert a period.

Line 10, page 2, strike out the words "for uninterrupted railroad traffic," and capitalize the first letter of the word "all."

Line 12, page 2, strike out the word "any" and insert the word "the," and after the word "bridge" insert the words "to be."

Line 14, page 2, change the word "complete" to "completed."

Line 15, page 2, strike out the words "such notice" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the date of service of such order."

Line 17, page 2, strike out "2" and insert "3."

Add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Amend the title to read as follows:

"A bill extending the time for construction of a bridge and for the maintenance of a pontoon and pile bridge by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. across the Missouri River at or near Chamberlain, S. Dak., and providing additional requirements for the bridge to be constructed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be so amended to conform to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. GANDY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF WAR RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take up and pass the bill H. R. 13273, with a committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I inquire for the benefit of the membership of the House whether there will be any further calls from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent to-day?

The SPEAKER. It depends on these suspensions. There are two or three bills that ought to be considered and passed in the interest of public business. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give the number on the calendar?

Mr. RAYBURN. Union Calendar 325.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13273) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and an act in amendment thereto approved October 6, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department" be, and is hereby, amended by adding the following new paragraph to section 210 of Article II of the said act:

"Provided, however, That whenever the commissioner shall by further investigation or reinvestigation modify the existing award, no reimbursement from the person receiving an allowance shall be required for allotments and allowances already paid nor shall any deductions be made from allotments and allowances to be paid in the future for any change in award made in previous allotments and allowances, except where it is conclusively shown that the person receiving the allowance does not bear the relationship to the enlisted man which is required by the act and except in cases of manifest fraud."

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from South Dakota say something about an amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. There is a committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to suspend the rules and pass this bill, together with the amendment. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand a second.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think about as good a statement as can be made about this bill is contained in a report made by the Secretary of the Treasury. I will ask that the Clerk read that in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 7, 1919.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In compliance with your request I have the honor to submit the views of the Treasury Department on H. R. 13273, introduced by Mr. TREADWAY.

This bill provides that when an award of allotment or family allowance is modified no reimbursement shall be required or future deduction made for moneys previously paid on the award. This bill goes straight to the heart of a matter which has given the Bureau of War Risk Insurance great concern. The war-risk insurance act, as it was originally passed and now stands, requires the bureau to make an investigation of each claim for family allowance. It was plain that if, at the beginning of the bureau's operations, no awards were to be made until the investigations could be completed, the very purpose of the allotment and family allowance features of the act would be practically defeated, for the investigations would take months, whereas the allotments and allowances were needed at once. Accordingly, the bureau decided to take the statements of the enlisted men as prima facie true and to make immediate awards on the basis of such statements. The bureau took this step advisedly, knowing full well that through erroneous statements or otherwise many awards would be made to persons who were not entitled to them. But the bureau felt bound to send the funds to the families of soldiers as rapidly as possible, trusting to the investigations to enable the bureau to detect and stop all awards that should not have been made.

The investigations have shown a large number of awards which should never have been made. The awards, of course, have been stopped. Upon stopping the awards, however, the bureau was confronted with the question whether it should attempt to recover the moneys erroneously paid. Deeming that it should exercise scrupulous regard as to the disbursements of public moneys, the bureau felt that it should, in so far as possible, recover the amount which should not have been originally paid out and consequently has asked for a refund. It has not been pleasant for the bureau to pursue this course, and it has done so only because of its conception of the duty laid upon it.

The bill introduced by Mr. TREADWAY will, if adopted, relieve the bureau of this duty. Subject to one modification, it meets the approval of the Treasury Department. This modification is that the bill should be so modified as to permit the bureau to recover in what may be called the flagrant cases. Among such cases may be mentioned the payment of family allowance to a former wife divorced who has remarried, or the payment of family allowance to a woman to whom the enlisted man was never married and with whom he had no legitimate relationship.

It is suggested, therefore, that the following clause be added at the end of the bill: "except where it is conclusively shown that the person receiving the allowance does not bear the relationship to the enlisted man which is required by the act."

With this modification incorporated in the bill, the Treasury Department recommends its prompt adoption.

Sincerely, yours,

CARTER GLASS,
Secretary.

HON. THETUS W. SIMS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I want first to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill why it was that the committee did not make some provision for continuing payments on these allowances that have been discontinued? As I understand this bill, it provides that no reimbursement shall be exacted from persons who have received allowances except in cases of fraud. Now, what I have in mind is this: As I understand it, there are some 70,000 cases where allowances have been canceled under the authority of this section which is now sought to be amended. The bureau has arbitrarily, it seems to me, taken that action. Statements have been made that in many instances the action of the bureau has been based on responses given by the beneficiaries. I have had complaints that where a boy has made an allotment and an allowance was granted the bureau has assumed to say that the income of the family is sufficient, and regardless of the peculiar conditions that may exist the allowance has been discontinued. Now, as I understand it this bill provides that if there has been no fraud the bureau shall not recoup what has been paid to the beneficiaries by keeping it out of future allotments. Take, for instance, a case where a boy is over on the other side and the family have been receiving this allowance and the allotment of the boy, and they have been cut off, and the contribution of the boy before he went into the service was $25, $35, or $40 a month. Is the committee going to make no provision for reinstating those allotments?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; and I do not think we should.

Mr. IGOE. When this insurance law was passed the statement went out that where the contribution of the boy was $35 a month and the parents were dependent upon it, if the boy allotted $15 the Government would add $20. If there were two parents and the boy contributed $35, he could get an allowance for each of those parents. The committee may say now, a year or more after that bill was passed, that that was not the intention, but the law says that if those parents were wholly or partly dependent upon this soldier they should be entitled to this allowance. Now, I have had cases brought to my attention—I have not the letters here, but I wish I could put some of them into the RECORD—where there are several children, and a father and mother perhaps, and because some answers have been made to the bureau which did not satisfy them these allowances have been cut off. This takes care of cases where they are asked to refund money and will relieve them of the obligation to refund; but how in the world are those people going to get along when they need this money? I know it was repeatedly stated that if the contributions were $25 or $35 a month they would go on.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman must understand that that is what we say yet, but the question of dependency must arise.

Mr. IGOE. Yes; "partly or wholly dependent."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In other words, it does not run to absolute pauperism.

Mr. IGOE. It does not run to absolute pauperism and never was so intended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course not.

Mr. IGOE. Now, here is the situation: They undertake to say that when the boy was contributing $35 a month, that was board. Well, anybody who has lived in a district such as mine, in a city, knows that where there are several children at home contributing to the support of the family that $35 a month is not board. When that boy left to go into the Army, to go across to France to fight for his country, the expenses of the family went on almost the same. They were keeping a home for him to return to, and they were paying just as much for rent, light, and fuel. The other children at home had to be educated, and the loss to the family was almost the entire $35. I have offered an amendment in the form of a separate bill, which I would offer now if it were permissible. I hope the House will be given an opportunity to fully consider this important matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be notified when I have used five minutes. So careless was the administration of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the allotments of Government money to persons who had no right to the same that the bureau for months past has been recovering monthly the enormous amount of $500,000 of payments from persons who were not entitled under the law to receive them. There would not be much criticism from any person in this House of the proposition to prevent the Government from trying to recoup itself for any allotments or allowances where it would be a hardship on the persons entitled to some allowance. But where the Government has paid money under obvious mistakes and no distress would follow its repayment, I claim there ought to be some provision for getting the money back. I have heard of cases where a wife has received double allowances, and has knowingly accepted them, though fraud was wanting in receiving it, but there is no provision in this bill whereby that money can be obtained from that person no matter what her financial condition may be. This bill absolutely protects those who are in affluence—a wife with property, who under the war-risk law was entitled to a certain allotment allowance. If she received double the amount by mistake of the bureau, the Government is barred from recovering that back. I do not think the gentleman who reports this bill intends to block the Government from recovering money under such circumstances, and yet that would be the effect of this bill. This is the first time this bill has been presented for consideration. No opportunity whatsoever is given for amendment under suspension of the rules. Oh, the gentleman can bring in these bills which will perpetuate these injustices on the Government—these unjust limitations on the Government—whereby it can not be reimbursed for money wrongfully paid.

As I said a moment ago, no one wishes to punish any allottee for money paid through the mistake of the Government that was received in good faith and used, if those people can not reimburse the Government. But this bill goes further than that. As originally introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], the Government would not even have the right to recover the money that was obtained by fraud. And even the Secretary of the Treasury, in the amendment he recommended, did not seek to cover that case. The only case he recommended was where it was conclusively shown that the person receiving the allowance did not bear the relationship to the enlisted man which is required by the act. I had hoped there would be some opportunity given in the consideration of the bill, which involves a saving maybe of hundreds of thousands of dollars, for an amendment which would do no hardship to the people who received the money, but which would protect the Government in cases of innocent mistake. No such provision is made and no opportunity to amend it is permitted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Is there any statement as to how much is involved in this question?

Mr. STAFFORD. No. There is no statement, although before the legislative committee the head of the bureau testified that they were recovering $500,000 from those who received this money who were not entitled to it under the law. As I said a moment ago, there is no desire upon the part of any Member here to cause hardship by withholding allotments and allowances from needy people, but there should be some provision in the bill whereby the Government could recover payment of money unlawfully paid where no hardship would result in demanding its return.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I have a good deal of sympathy with the attitude of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in his desire to protect the Treasury. I think, however, in considering the argument that he has made that we should take into account these thousands of reexaminations that have been made, the applications having already gone out over the country. People situated as he describes, not needing the allowance, I should suppose would come under the description of having secured the money, possibly, by fraud or by misrepresentation. There is a very marked distinction between the allotment and allowance features, and his description of these cases covers those who may not have needed the allowance at any stage of the procedure. Therefore I presume it would be within the range of fraud.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Who determines whether or not it is a worthy case?

Mr. TREADWAY. Section 210 of the original act provides that the bureau shall make examination and reexamination, or, in the language of the act, "shall investigate and reinvestigate" and modify the award, and this condition we are endeavoring to correct in this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Those examinations are made by local appointees, suggested by somebody, some 90,000 of them throughout the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; and questionnaires sent out—all sorts of methods.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And those investigators are local people who go and size up a family in an ex parte and perfunctory way and decide in their own mind whether or not they ought to have the allotment. What defense has the boy who is fighting for his country over in Europe against these sneak investigations? What protection has he against some one who just arbitrarily, possibly because of some neighborhood or family enmity, or something of that kind, can make a report that it should not be paid; that the boy did not contribute that much, and that therefore they ought not to have it, when he does not know anything about it, and his investigation is not corroborated by anyone, but is purely his personal feeling? Has that boy any redress or have those parents any redress or any recourse?

Mr. TREADWAY. Not the slightest.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have had some complaints where I think an injustice has been done through the sending out of that kind of reports, without any opportunity of defending against them, when the boy is fighting at the front and the mother needs the money at home, and some fellow who is staying at home makes this report and cuts off and seriously injures the family. I do not like to see an irresponsible fellow of that sort be made an inquisitor and a court of last resort. I think some of them have been swelling up too much and swaggering around as "Government agents."

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Colorado is correct, and so far as I am concerned I would rather take the statement of the boy and his mother as to whether they need the money than the statement of some jealous neighbor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is the way I feel about it. There seems to be no special qualification for these so-called investigators, and while I presume most of them are fair-minded good citizens I think some of them ought to be investigated and eliminated.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. There are cases in which allotments and allowances have been paid twice. There are cases in which they have been paid erroneously. Would this proposition correct that?

Mr. TREADWAY. It would not. Those are mistakes of the bureau which can readily be corrected where it is absolutely a mistake. There is no question but that this description in the phraseology of the bill would not protect the persons having received two payments of an allotment. That matter came up before the committee, and I think the gentleman from Texas will agree with me that that situation was described to the committee.

Mr. KING. There are a number of cases of this character. Allowances have been paid, and the bureau have discovered or think they have discovered that there was no reason for the payment, and then they have asked people to send the money back. In many cases those people have borrowed the money and have sent it back to the bureau. Is there any provision in the bill whereby that money may be paid back to them if it is found that they are entitled to it under this bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. I wish there might be, under the discretion of the bureau and the Secretary.

Mr. KING. Could not there be a short amendment incorporated in this bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. I doubt if we ought to incorporate it in the act, in view of the fact the Treasury Department has said it should live up to the actual phraseology of the original law. We are endeavoring to stop just that procedure in the future. I have no doubt the statement of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, that there have been paid back into the Treasury many thousands of dollars, and I personally think a great deal of it very likely ought not to have been paid back. I have numerous letters——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Brought back by a form of coercion.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is a certain amount of coercion coming to men living far off—take the territory of the gentleman from Washington and my own, for instance—in that any official letter from the Government carries with it a certain weight and authority.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the fear of those parents that it will be taken out of the pay of the soldier.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman. The hardship that has come under the interpretation of the law now in force is this, that it does come directly out of the pay of the soldier. In other words, the notice that the department sends out directing a refund says, "We are taking out of your allotment for the months of November and December $15 for each month." That is the man's own pay for his services as a soldier. Let me read just a line bearing on this very subject from a letter I received this morning:

If they do not want to give the allowance, why am I deprived of the allotment?

That is the actual situation, that hundreds of these cases have been carried through by the department looking to a retention of the soldier's own pay, which he had the right to ask for, and not as an allotment to his relatives at all, that he did not expect was going to carry with it an allowance. There has been endless hardship resulting from the enforcement of this law, and I think the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury absolutely states the case that the department must obey the phraseology of the law, that it is very difficult for them to have such a large amount as proposed by this bill. It seems to me we ought to have passed this amendment to the war-risk act some time ago in order to stop this very return into the Treasury of cases where hardship would result in asking families to reimburse the Government. It is not in accordance with the war-risk act to have these reimbursements made, and I maintain that we should hasten this change in the law in order to prevent the continuation of these instances that carry not only hardships to the recipients but also in many instances a feeling to the parents, as you and I have received letters to show the feeling, that there has been some fraud performed by their soldier boy. No such insinuation as that ought to be carried in the minds of the parents of the boys who have been in our service, and therefore I trust that the House will hastily pass this measure. [Applause.] I yield back what remaining time I have.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and (in the opinion of the Speaker two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13440) transferring jurisdiction and control over Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers from the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War for use for Army hospital purposes for the period covered by the exigencies growing out of the present war.

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction and control over Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, located at Hot Springs, S. Dak., be, and the same hereby is, transferred for the period covered by the exigencies growing out of the present war from the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War for use by the Medical Department of the Army for hospital purposes.

SEC. 2. That upon the passage of the exigencies growing out of the present war, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, the Secretary of War shall cause said sanitarium to be vacated by the Medical Department of the Army, and thereupon jurisdiction and control over said sanitarium shall revert to said Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

SEC. 3. That the various items of appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for the support, maintenance, and other necessary expenses of said Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers be, and they hereby are, made available for payment of the cost of the transfer of the members of said sanitarium to other branches of the national home and for the transfer of any property found to be necessary to transfer therefrom to other branches of the national home and for the support of the branches to which said members are transferred to the extent of the allotments thereof made by said board of managers in consideration of and in the amount of an extra expense incurred by reason of said transfers and for the retransfer from said branches to said Battle Mountain Sanitarium of the persons and property transferred as aforesaid at such time as jurisdiction and control over said Battle Mountain Sanitarium shall be reinvested in said board of managers in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. SLOAN. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection.

Mr. SLOAN. And I suggest there is not a quorum present. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from South Dakota to withdraw temporarily his bill so as to enable the House to pass one more of these unanimous-consent bills.

Mr. GANDY. So I do not lose my rights in the premises.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. What became of the point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws that temporarily at the request of the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. On the condition the bill will not be called up to-day?

The SPEAKER. No; it will be called up as soon as we pass this unanimous-consent bill. [Laughter.] The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE IN TENNESSEE.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1836) to provide for the appointment of a district judge in the middle judicial district of the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection until I make a statement.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I reserve it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to call the attention of the House to a statement made by the Federal judge who is holding court in middle Tennessee and also in east Tennessee, in the two judicial districts. In a letter to my colleague, Mr. FISHER, after setting forth the state of the docket and the amount of work involved there, he says:

As you will see, the situation is one in which I am working under constant strain and under the pressure of accumulated work; a very disadvantageous condition for good work. I have also been unable to go to Cincinnati to sit on the circuit court of appeals, as requested by Judge Warrington. Without outside assistance, it would be plainly impossible for me to keep up the work; and even with such assistance, it takes all my time and energies and does not enable me to keep up with the work on schedule time. In short, the experience of the last year or two has deepened my conviction, previously expressed, that it is impossible for one judge to keep up the work in the two districts with the promptness and thoroughness which the due administration of justice requires, and to force me, reluctantly, to the conclusion that, in my judgment, some measure of permanent assistance in this work is required in the public interest.

I had hoped that with the cessation of the war and the enactment of Federal prohibition, there might be a lightening in the criminal dockets of the courts, but in view of the legislation which it is announced is to be brought forward in Congress in reference to the enforcement, through the Federal courts, of the prohibitory legislation of Congress and the provisions of the constitutional amendment just ratified, I think now that this expectation was probably not well founded, and that, on the contrary, with the additional Federal legislation which will probably result both in connection with national prohibition and the other problems of readjustment to peace conditions, the normal work in the Federal courts on the criminal side alone will not be permanently decreased, but, on the contrary, will probably be permanently increased; and that with the general resumption of the civil litigation in the Federal courts following peace, there will be in the near future considerably more litigation in both districts, both civil and criminal, than before the war; and that the task of promptly and efficiently keeping up the work in the two districts by one judge will be made increasingly difficult, and continue to be, as it now is, impossible.

This is signed by Judge Edward T. Sanford.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] adhere to his objection?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it may go to the foot of the calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is not.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. On this vote 265 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Chair appoints the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] as tellers.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska objects, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] as tellers.

Mr. GANDY and Mr. SLOAN took their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 45.

So a second was considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] have 20 minutes apiece.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the transfer temporarily of Battle Mountain Sanitarium at Hot Springs, S. Dak., from the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War for use for Army hospital purposes. It follows identically the same language, with one exception, of the bill which this House and the Senate passed and which became a law some time early last fall transferring the Southern Branch Soldiers' Home at Hampton, Va., to the Army for use as an Army hospital. The one exception is that that bill provided that the Hampton home should be transferred for the duration of the war and this bill provides that the home at Hot Springs, S. Dak., shall be transferred during the exigencies growing out of the present war.

In order that the House may thoroughly understand the situation, I want to say that the Surgeon General first asked of the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home whether they would entertain a suggestion or request to transfer this institution, and the board said it would. A committee from the Surgeon General's office went out and inspected the institution and made due report to the Surgeon General and to the General Staff. The Surgeon General then requested of the Secretary of War authority, so far as the War Department was concerned, to take over the institution. The Secretary of War approved that request, and then I introduced the bill in the House.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is this to be a measure of economy?

Mr. GANDY. I so understand it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Do you think it would be economy to take these soldiers, landed on the Atlantic coast, and transfer them for 1,600 miles to the hospital?

Mr. GANDY. The Surgeon General's office is undertaking——

Mr. SHERWOOD. I do not care what the Surgeon General's office undertakes. What I want to know is what the gentleman thinks of this. That was not established as a home but as a sanitarium.

Mr. GANDY. I think it is a matter of economy. I have here a certified copy of a letter, under date of November 23, from the board of managers to the Surgeon General, in which it is stated—

If the Medical Department of the United States Army desires the use of Battle Mountain Sanitarium for hospital purposes, the board of managers will gladly cooperate in having the same transferred as soon as the members can be transferred to other homes. There is space in other branches of the home where the members could be comfortably cared for. Possibly there would be some members who would be physically unable to stand the journey and who would have to be left at the branch to be cared for by the incoming administration.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman says some of them might be left there. Under the bill would the Surgeon General be compelled to leave any there or would he have them all removed?

Mr. GANDY. I will say that in the case of the Hampton branch home—and then I will answer the gentleman's question—it was found that 43 members ought not to be removed. Those members of the Hampton home were left at that institution and are now being cared for there by the staff of the institution under the Surgeon General's office, and the Surgeon General has given his word to the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home that these members at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, who ought not to be removed for physical reasons, shall be left there.

I want to call to the attention of this House the record of the transfer of men from the Hampton home. Two hundred and fifty hospital patients were transferred and 300 other members of the home. They were taken in sleeping cars from Hampton to Johnson City, Tenn., where space was available in another soldiers' home branch. Forty-three were left at Hampton. Of the 550 who were transferred, including 250 hospital patients, not one death occurred en route, and at the end of 30 days, when the Soldiers' Home Board made its inspection at Johnson City, Tenn., there had been then but one death in the 550 transferred, a death rate which was below the usual death rate for men of that age.

On Friday of last week, in response to my telegram, the chief surgeon and acting governor of Battle Mountain Sanitarium wired me that there were on that day 330 members of the home at the sanitarium; that 215 are Civil War veterans, 87 are Spanish-American War veterans, and 29 are veterans of other wars, and that in his judgment there are only 37 who ought not to be moved. That is the statement of the chief surgeon of the institution.

Then I want to call to the attention of the House the fact that less than a mile across the canyon from this institution there is a magnificent State soldiers' home, in which on the same day that the Surgeon General sent me that information the superintendent of the State home wired me that he then had 74 vacant beds there. The governor of the State wired me that in addition to those who are physically unable to stand the trip and who it is proposed to leave there, if there are others who, because of peculiar climatic conditions might wish to stay in that locality, arrangements could be made with the State soldiers' home board that would permit them to go less than a mile across the canyon and be maintained in the State home.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman state how many patients this hospital will accommodate—how many beds?

Mr. GANDY. On the War Department's rating, this institution will accommodate 600.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What would be the objection to having those other beds filled up by returning soldiers who are wounded and ought to be treated there under the present management, and leave the men there who are there?

Mr. GANDY. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that that is a matter of policy that might be worked out.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then this bill would not be necessary.

Mr. GANDY. The institution is under civilian control. The transfer contemplated is a military proposition. In the emergency, with thousands of young men coming back from overseas who need care in an institution such as this, with the knowledge given me by the Soldiers' Home Board that in their home at Danville, Ill., they have to-day almost a thousand vacant beds, and the knowledge that every man who physically ought to stay will be kept there, I say to you, gentlemen of the House, this institution ought to be made available immediately for use as an Army hospital. While it is true that the veterans of former wars deserve the best at the hands of the Nation, yet I am satisfied that there are mighty few old soldiers who would not willingly and cheerfully inconvenience themselves to help make a place that sick and wounded soldiers of this war may be cared for. The soldiers' homes are not nearly filled to capacity, and just now when there are so many young veterans who need hospital facilities and care, a temporary consolidation will make available at Battle Mountain Sanitarium several hundred beds.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GANDY. I do.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. What do the old soldiers themselves say about this?

Mr. GANDY. I was at the Hot Springs after information of this proposed change had been printed in many newspapers in South Dakota and adjoining States, when it had been known for some time that such a transfer was proposed and after officials of the Surgeon General's office had visited the institution. Not one member of the sanitarium to me offered any objection. I have had numerous letters from members saying that in the temporary emergency they are perfectly willing to be inconvenienced by being taken to some other soldiers' home.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. What is the gentleman's impression as to the majority of the old soldiers there? Is there practically any opposition to this bill being passed?

Mr. GANDY. I want to be perfectly frank with the gentleman. I have understood in the last few days that there is. This institution has cost the Government complete something in excess of $2,000,000. Out in that great stretch of territory the Surgeon General's office must find a hospital somewhere. If they do not use this, then there must be bought, leased, or built some other institution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was under the impression that this hospital was particularly adapted for the treatment of special diseases, on account of the hot springs there, and that old soldiers were sent there on that account. Is that the case?

Mr. GANDY. Well, that is true; that there are hot springs there that have medicinal qualities. Yet this institution has been conducted on the same basis as other soldiers' homes, and men go there the same as they go to the Danville Home.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GANDY. For a very brief question.

Mr. RAMSEYER. How many old soldiers are there there at the present time?

Mr. GANDY. Three hundred and thirty on Friday.

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the capacity of the hospital?

Mr. GANDY. On the War Department space rating the capacity is about 600. By glassing in the big verandas there the Surgeon General estimates that he can take care of about 1,000 at the institution.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves 10 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I oppose this measure, not because I do not desire the home-coming soldiers to have all the privileges of efficient and proper hospital treatment, because perhaps I have as great a personal interest in that line as any man on this floor; but I do object to it as a matter of good faith to those who have the prior right of occupancy exclusive under the law, but which they do not claim nor do I for them. This institution was constructed in 1902 upon the strenuous advocacy of the Members of the House and Senate from the State of South Dakota and that region. Congress insisted that the volunteer soldiers of the United States should have, not a new soldiers' home alone, because there were several, but that they should have a sanitarium which they could call their own and where they could go when they should be afflicted with particular diseases incident to the advanced life of the old volunteer soldiers.

I shall put in the RECORD, if I am given the privilege, portions of the reports made by the House and the Senate Military Affairs Committees of the Fifty-seventh Congress, showing why this particular place of all places in the United States should be selected for an old soldiers' sanitarium—a volunteer soldiers' sanitarium. The purpose was that it should not be under the control of the War Department, because the volunteer soldiers, not only of the Civil War but of the Spanish-American War, have had some very definite opinions about the War Department's control of their declining years, their sickness, and afflictions. And so now, with little notice being given, the public knowing very little about it, this bill was sprung upon the floor the other day.

True, it was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. That Committee on Military Affairs, I am satisfied, did not call on any of the Members of the House. That committee did not hear from those who would naturally be expected to object. I find the statement in the letter of the Secretary of War here saying that the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home were in favor of this measure. On the floor of this House the man oldest in service on the board of managers, speaking to me this morning, said, "They," meaning the board, "said they had not any objections, but I have not seen any evidence that they favored this bill." But whether they did favor it or not, and whether there is one soldier there or 500, the Congress of the United States can not afford to say to the volunteer soldiers of the Civil War, those who had an established home there on account of the special curative and healing qualities of the waters, that because there are other soldiers coming these old soldiers shall be evicted. It is not a question of giving treatment there to the soldiers who are coming, because I would have no objection to that, and neither, as I understand, would the members of that sanitarium have any objection to the wounded or sick soldiers coming from overseas being admitted there and receiving such treatment as might be available. But there is a great deal of difference between obtaining and enjoying the hospitality of a home, whether it is a soldiers' home or a private home, and always playing the part of a guest, and the other course of kicking out the owner after you have been admitted. I think it is the wren among birds which, after becoming a guest, finding there is to be too little room for guest and host at the same time, sends the other bird to Danville or elsewhere.

Senate Report No. 129, Military Affairs Committee, of the Fifty-seventh Congress, 1902, adopted a report entitled "Senate Report No. 1077 of the Fifty-sixth Congress," which in turn adopted Senate Report No. 1085, Fifty-fourth Congress, from which I quote, as follows:

As is expressed in its title, this measure provides for the erection of a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at the city of Hot Springs, State of South Dakota. It is a location possessing advantages that can not elsewhere be acquired—advantages provided by nature, and so rare in their combination that they are duplicated in only a few instances the world over. From the surrounding hills come forth unfailing streams of water, medicated and tempered in the great laboratory of subterranean earth, endowed with health-giving properties in relative proportions so exact that man, with all the skill that scientific knowledge imparts, may strive in vain to improve upon, and at last can only imitate. It is the product of centuries of processes—a part of the grand scheme of nature, which, in preparing the earth for man's habitation, made provision also to combat the ills to which man has fallen heir.

As a site for the proposed home the citizens of Hot Springs agree to donate ground sufficient for all the needs of the home and to give a deed of perpetual lease of one or more of the medicinal hot springs which there abound. Under the provisions of the bill both the home site and the spring or springs are to be selected by the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, the donors of the property agreeing to abide by the choice of that organization. It is also provided that the Board of Managers are to have exclusive jurisdiction over the property.

* * * * * * *

(3) That the medicinal water at Hot Springs, S. Dak., is a curative agent for ailments most common among ex-soldiers, experience having demonstrated this to the satisfaction of the officials who have watched the effect in a stated number of cases there subjected to experimental treatment.

* * * * * * *

Regarding the curative properties of the medicinal waters of the Hot Springs your committee desires to speak at length. These springs were the resort of the Indians long before the white man found his way into the jealously guarded realm of the Black Hill's country, and were considered by the aborigines as a panacea for all diseases. Their fame had penetrated the confines of civilization long before the advancing wave of white settlement had swept back the line of opposition and driven the Indians from their last rallying point. As soon as the Anglo-Saxon had possessed himself of this long-contested ground, business methods began to be applied to the medicinal springs. They were made available to the public, their properties ascertained, and their curative qualities proclaimed. An extensive hotel was erected, baths constructed, and conveniences for the sick provided. In 1879 the State of South Dakota located and erected a soldiers' home at Hot Springs, and it is now a large institution, filled with veterans of the late war who reside in South Dakota. The waters of the springs have been thoroughly tested, and in every instance have been found efficacious.

Official evidence of important facts in connection with these springs comes to your committee in the form of a report from Assistant Inspector General Averell, who says:

* * * * * * *

"The unusual number of members discharged from the State home during the year by reason of their recovery from the disabilities which had entitled them to its care and benefits first attracted my attention, and subsequently the results of the remarkable test made last year, 1893, upon 30 disabled men selected and sent from the western branch of the National Home have induced my belief in the efficacy of the waters of the Hot Springs for rheumatism, sciatica, spinal irritation, and nervous prostration."

WM. W. AVERELL, U. S. A.,
Assistant Inspector General,
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Gen. JOHN C. BLACK,
Chairman Subcommittee on Soldiers' Homes, etc.

* * * * * * *

Commandant Lucas, of the South Dakota Soldiers' Home, located at Hot Springs, in a report to Assistant Inspector Gen. Averell, says:

"After a careful observation of the results in the treatment of our sixty-odd veterans for severe and desperate cases of rheumatism, I am constrained to say that I have no longer doubts about the curative properties of the waters. Every case that has been treated in the home (not an exception) has resulted in a perfect cure, or the patient is approaching it. These results I regard as little less than miraculous, when the enfeebled and broken-down condition of these men is taken into account. The waters are equally good and effective in treating cases of indigestion, scrofula, and all skin or cutaneous diseases."

The Hot Springs of South Dakota are located in the mountainous western end of the State—a region abounding in delightful scenery and all the health-giving influences of nature in the rough. No more charming surroundings can be found at any of the health resorts of the world. These springs lie within the boundaries of Fall River County, and about them has accumulated a community of a couple of thousand people, incorporated as a city of the second class. Its buildings are constructed with a generous display of architectural skill and taste. The city can be reached over two lines of railway. Its altitude is 3,400 feet above sea level. The atmosphere of that region is dry and bracing. Lying in a sheltered valley it is protected from winter's rigors, and it is altogether a most satisfactory abiding place for invalids or for those in search of recreation.

Further quoting House Report No. 623, Military Affairs Committee, Fifty-seventh Congress (1902), I present the following:

The purpose of the bill is to provide a national sanitarium in connection with the National Home, where all soldiers suffering from rheumatism, sciatica, nervous prostration, and kindred troubles may be treated and cared for, thus relieving the crowded condition of the various branches of the home. It is believed that hundreds so afflicted may be permanently cured and many more relieved of severe pain and suffering.

This bill is identical in form with H. R. 2967 of the Fifty-sixth Congress, upon which this committee made a favorable report to the House on February 28, 1900. The report set forth at length the merits of this bill, and is adopted as a part of this present report. The conditions since the date of our former report have emphasized the necessity for this legislation.

* * * * * * *

The prevalence of disease among the members of the home, particularly rheumatic troubles, has caused the Board of Managers to investigate for several years a means of affording relief. During the year 1901, 1,025 members of the Western Branch alone were afflicted with rheumatism in its various forms and 407 in the Northwestern Branch, at Milwaukee, Wis. Attention was early called to Hot Springs, S. Dak., by reason of the many remarkable cures of people seeking the benefits of the medicinal springs at that place. An official test was made in 1893 by Gen. W. W. Averell, assistant inspector general of the National Home, by direction of the Board of Managers. Thirty members of the Western Branch were taken from Leavenworth to Hot Springs and kept there a period of 60 days. The most serious cases were selected. At the end of that period 44 per cent of those treated for rheumatism were pronounced entirely cured and the balance very much benefited. Dr. R. D. Jennings, surgeon in charge of the test, in his official report said:

"As will be seen, almost every man was afflicted with rheumatic or nervous troubles, the same being cured in almost every instance. I am satisfied that a careful inspection by the medical board on the return of the men will bear me out in saying that, all things considered—age of patients, shattered constitutions of some of them, variety and complication of diseases, and the chronic nature of all—the result of this test, as shown by detailed report, is in every substantial sense highly satisfactory. A realization of all the claims put forth by the promoters of this experiment as to the virtues of the waters and climate of Hot Springs, S. Dak., and the desirability of this place for the location of a United States sanitarium for the treatment of such chronic disease as most usually affect the old soldier is fulfilled."

The unequivocal indorsement of the hot waters, climate, and healthful location of Hot Springs by Gen. Averell was not made hastily or on limited information. He has inspected the State Home located there seven times, and carefully examined every claim made for the efficacy of the waters in cases of rheumatism and other diseases prevalent among the veterans.

Your committee believes the measure is highly meritorious, and that the establishment of such an institution would prove of the highest benefit to the diseased and enfeebled veterans, and especially to those disabled with rheumatism and kindred ailments.

* * * * * * *

Resolutions adopted at the national encampment, September, 1898, by the Grand Army of the Republic, requesting Congress to locate a branch soldiers' home at Hot Springs, S. Dak., to be known as the sanitarium of the national system.

Whereas the people of the United States, through their State and national legislatures, have met with matchless kindness and generosity the matchless victories won in their interests by the sailors and soldiers of the war for the suppression of the slaveholders' rebellion; and

Whereas this recognition, in part, of great and arduous deeds accomplished by the veterans of 1861–1865 has been in providing a system of homes for the disabled and decrepit sailor and soldier; and

Whereas rheumatism and nervous troubles are those which chiefly afflict these old heroes and necessitate their entrance in the homes; and

Whereas the directors of the national homes made a test of great severity of the virtue of the waters of the hot springs located in the city of Hot Springs, S. Dak., as a cure for such ailments by sending there for treatment a carload of soldiers in the worst and most stubborn stages of rheumatism and kindred ills; and

Whereas said test was so entirely successful that Gen. Averell, a director and inspector general of the national board of directors for the national homes, who had personal supervision of the test being made, reported to the full board that the waters of Hot Springs, S. Dak., contained the medicinal properties that were, in their application, a practical cure for persons so afflicted, and that the per cent of cures effected based on the number of occupants of the several homes of the country showed that the cost of a national sanitarium at Hot Springs would be met by the numbers of men that would be healed and sent to their homes, and the public thereby relieved from further expense in their care; and

Whereas the system of National and State homes can not be completed nor brought to that state of perfection not only demanded, but within easy reach without the utilization of the healing properties of these waters through the means of a large and commodious sanitarium where our comrades can be properly treated and cared for and restored to their health and homes; and

Whereas the greater the number of the homes for those who seek their advantages and the greater the number of the occupants thereof, the greater the necessity for the sanitarium at Hot Springs, S. Dak., the erection of which home is not so important for the shelter of the soldiers' bodies as for relieving their pains and healing the ailments with which they are afflicted, as, upon the testimony of the highest authority, they can not be relieved or healed elsewhere: Therefore be it

Resolved, By the Grand Army of the Republic, in national camp assembled, that our representatives in Congress are hereby respectfully, but earnestly, urged to support the bill now pending providing for the location of a branch soldiers' home at Hot Springs, S. Dak., to be equipped for and known as the sanitarium for the system of soldiers' and sailors' homes throughout the country.

And be it further resolved, That the commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a committee of seven comrades, whose duty it shall be to wait upon Congress and present in proper form and manner the merits of the proposition in the foregoing resolutions.

Mr. GORDON. The Government of the United States owns this home and has paid $2,000,000 for it; and these old soldiers are given permission to remain there, those who do not wish to be removed.

Mr. SLOAN. They are not given such permission in this bill, and there is not the faintest suggestion that they have any right there.

Mr. GORDON. Do you challenge the statement of Mr. GANDY on that subject?

Mr. SLOAN. I do if he says what your question implies. It is not in the bill, and I can read the English language.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My impression is that we created this board of managers for soldiers' homes in order that the managers might be in sympathy with the members of the homes. That was the purpose of it originally.

This bill would transfer that sympathetic supervision from the home managers, many of whom were comrades of the old soldiers, to those directly attached to the United States Army?

Mr. SLOAN. That is quite true. I desire to say that Clarendon E. Adams, commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, in a telegram to me, denounces this bill as infamous. The department commander of the Grand Army of my State, Hon. J. S. Hoagland, uses stronger terms, as follows:

If it is the desire of the author of the bill, known as the Gandy bill, to kill off quickly our comrades now at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, such a move, if adopted by Congress, will be very effective to that end. Nearly all of the comrades at such sanitarium are there because of some organic trouble afflicting them. God will never forgive a Member of Congress who will support such a measure.

Dr. F. Brothers, of Beatrice, Nebr., a Grand Army of the Republic man in whom I have the utmost confidence, at present in this home, says that 99 per cent of the soldiers up there are opposed to this measure. To say at this time to the soldiers of the old war, located as they are in a home established for them, that they shall be taken from that home, not for the period of the war, as was done in the Hampton case, but for the period of the exigencies growing out of the war, which would mean that a soldier brought in would stay there as long as he lived under the terms of this bill if the War Department saw fit.

I read the report of the Secretary of War. His letter is there, and I want every warm-blooded man in this House to read it and ponder over it. Not a suggestion is given as to any consideration for the old Volunteer soldier. If he thought the veterans were opposed to it, he gave that fact no comment. If he considered that they favored it, there was no commendation for their extraordinary generosity. Every part of it reads as if the man who wrote it would spit icicles and breathe liquid air.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Is it not conceded that practically every soldiers' home in the United States is being conducted at 50 per cent capacity?

Mr. SLOAN. Whether that is true or not, if you want to distribute these sick or wounded soldiers in the sanitariums of the United States take them to sanitariums and homes and fill up the beds, but leave the sanitarium as it is. The grizzled veterans of 1861 to 1865 would welcome the returning heroes of 1917 to 1919. I know that my two surviving sons, grandsons of a veteran, would be ready to tolerate their veteran grandfather's presence in his own home.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Would the gentleman advise that all of these soldiers' homes in the United States be run at half capacity for the veterans of other wars, and that the United States then proceed to build another large number of homes?

Mr. SLOAN. That is entirely beside the question. Fill up all of them. Fill up this sanitarium, if you will, but leave the old boys in their sanitarium home and in charge. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Gen. SHERWOOD].

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, almost uniformly I vote with my committee on all these public questions, but I am a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. I know that the Grand Army of the Republic is opposed to this bill. First, I do not believe that this Battle Mountain institution was established as a home. It was established as a sanitarium, because of the curative qualities of the water located there, and not as a home. I have here an editorial from the organ of the Grand Army of the Republic, which will appear in the paper this week, against this bill. As a measure of economy I do not believe the bill ought to pass for this reason: All of the soldiers that come from across the seas, a distance of 3,000 miles, are landed on the seacoast, and as a humane proposition I do not believe that we ought to transport those wounded and disabled soldiers 1,600 miles inland to a place where they have very severe winters, especially the soldiers that come from the South. The editorial to which I refer is as follows:

AT ITS OLD TRICKS.

The Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home is at its old tricks of bringing severe discomforts to the veterans in the homes. Following hard upon the outrageous transfer of the veterans at the Hampton home to the high, cold mountains of East Tennessee, a scheme has been started to oust the rheumatics, consumptives, and neurotics and other invalids at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium into other homes, where they can not have the great benefits of the climate and waters of the South Dakota Sanitarium.

The War Department was much pressed for room in which to accommodate the returning soldiers, so had evolved the astounding plan to dispossess veterans of the Civil War of their especial sanitarium home. The resolution was promptly objected to by Representative SLOAN, of Nebraska, and went over for further consideration.

It is more than hinted that there is a strong real estate syndicate back of this movement. A fine hotel has been built at Battle Mountain, which is now owned by a syndicate, and it is assumed that the syndicate wants to make a social center of Battle Mountain, which will bring a flood of tourists, and consequent great profits, to the hotel and real estate men.

In the first place, this is a breach of faith. The Grand Army of the Republic, with Past Commander H. E. Palmer, of Nebraska, as the moving spirit, succeeded in getting a hospital established at Battle Mountain for the institutional treatment of rheumatism and other diseases incident to old age and disability. This expectation has been abundantly confirmed by the benefits received by the veterans who have gone thither. They are almost unanimously strong in their praises of how they have improved by the water, climate, and excellent treatment. To scatter these ailing old men to other homes would be an intolerable hardship and shorten their lives We had an example of this in the recent transfer of the inmates of the Soldiers' Home at Hampton to the mountain home in East Tennessee.

The transfer was plotted by the National Board of Managers and carried out with a heartless disregard of the comfort and wishes of the unfortunate members of the home. Hampton was specifically dedicated to the aged veterans of the wars of the Republic, and they found much comfort there. It has the mildest climate of any of the soldiers' homes. On the other hand, the isothermal line of Harrisburg extends down toward Chattanooga, and the mountains of east Tennessee are about as cold as those of central Pennsylvania. The daily weather reports show this. The slightest regard for the comfort of the inmates was shown in the transfer. They had to hang around for hours after they had been ordered to get ready and assemble before the train was ready for them, and then they were packed into untidy tourist's cars with only a meager supply of food, and had another long wait in Richmond before they started on their tiresome journey to east Tennessee.

Judging from the Hampton experience, what can be expected when the poor rheumatics and asthmatics of Battle Mountain shall be transferred to the Danville Soldiers' Home?

The wrong of disturbing the veterans who had found the mild climate of Hampton so conducive to longevity is emphasized by the circumstances of the great Chamberlain Hotel. The Chamberlain Hotel is built on Government ground, and is a luxurious midway stopping place for the wealthy of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia in their flight to Florida from the oncoming winter, and again in the spring when they return North. These men were not disturbed by the exigencies of the war, nor the Chamberlain Hotel commandeered for a hospital. Only the poor old veterans were dislodged.

The soldiers' home at Hampton will greatly enhance the attractions of Old Point Comfort as a social center when converted to an Army hospital. Thousands of officers will be sent there for recuperation, which will add much to the gaiety of the season at the Chamberlain and furnish acceptable beaux for the young society belles who congregate there. The Government has an abundance of ground at Old Point Comfort upon which it could have erected hospitals the same as the rushed-up buildings in Washington. This was the natural course if the Government did not wish to commandeer the luxurious apartments of the Chamberlain for a hospital.

So far as I can learn—and I have some information about the sentiment of the Grand Army—they are opposed to taking these old veterans, staggering to a near-by grave, from the place where they have been getting special treatment, and transferring them some place else, nobody seems to know where. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, on the part of the veterans of the Civil War and of the Spanish War, I am sure that I can truthfully say there is nothing that this Nation can do for its returning soldiers that they will not approve and ratify. In this case this sanitarium was established for the rheumatics, the neurotics, the consumptives, and those veterans of our armies having special diseases who might be treated advantageously at these hot springs. The springs are the great feature of this sanitarium. There are more than 300 such crippled veterans at this Battle Mountain Sanitarium.

Mr. Speaker, I have voted for every facility for the soldiers of this war and for its successful conduct. I have voted for those measures under which it is possible now for the Government of the United States to establish hospitals wherever they are needed and such character of hospitals as are needed. I believe that the Medical Department of the Army can utilize the unused beds of these institutions, the national soldiers' homes, for the soldiers of this war and that they should do so. But is the United States so poor—so poor in patriotism and so poor in money—that in order to obtain hospital room for the soldiers coming back it is necessary to eject from their homes, provided by a grateful people, the soldiers of 50 years ago? [Cries of "No!"] Shall we remove from the Battle Mountain Sanitarium those cripples of the Spanish War who are hobbling around the hot springs?

Mr. Speaker, the idea is repulsive. Let us look forward 50 years from now. Another war may come. Will those who succeed us in the Congress of that day say to the men who may go there as a result of the misfortunes of the recent war and who will then be a half century older: "You have got to get out of here and spend the last few years of your lives in other and strange places"? I say no. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH].

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I have voted in committee for every proposition or request of any department of this Government, and they have necessarily been numerous, especially the Medical Department, seeking or asking for increased hospital facilities to treat and restore to health the young heroes of the present war, and I shall continue to do so with heart and soul, but, Lord help me, I can not and will not vote to take from my comrades of 1861 to 1865 the comforts that this great Government has provided especially for them. The Battle Mountain Sanitarium is not a hospital; it is a place of comfort and care, expressly assigned to disabled volunteer soldiers whose disabilities, usually old age, are beyond medical cure. That is all I care to say about it. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I have the facts that have been written to me from the Battle Mountain Sanitarium by an inmate there who comes from Ohio. He says:

> We have 280 Civil War boys here and 75 Spanish War boys, a total of about 400 and a capacity of a little over 500.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me right there?

Mr. FESS. I might say to my colleague that my informant says that 280 of the inmates are from the Civil War and 75 from the Spanish War, and then, counting the employees, the total amounts to 400—if the gentleman had mathematics in mind.

Mr. GARD. I did not have in mind mathematics, but the gentleman used the word "inmate." They are not inmates; they are members of the National Home for Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. FESS. I was not using the term "inmates" in the legal sense the gentleman has in mind, and I accept the correction. I ought not to have made the statement in that way. The average age of the men, according to the statement of my informant, is 76, and they are invalids. He further states that it seems cruel to these invalided soldiers "to take these old men out of here at the peril of their lives, if the Congress could know the real purpose." He appeals to me as a Civil War soldier to ask Congress "to look into the cause for wanting to shorten the lives of the old boys of 61 to 65."

The proposition here is to remove these invalided soldiers from the positions of comfort secured for them by the Government to make room for others who must be cared for, and can be cared for, in places other than this particular place, and I remind my colleagues that everyone realizes that in the stress of this present war we are apt to forget our duty to the Civil War veterans, whose numbers are growing less daily, and the old soldier is constantly being reminded that there is no place for him any more in the sympathies of the people of the Republic for whose life he fought and suffered. Even the benefactions established by the Government of the Nation to relieve his concern in his last days, such as this sanitarium, must now be taken from him. I for one am ready to vote every facility to take care of the present soldiers in the present war, in whose care we will all share, because many of us have sons in the war, and all of us have friends, but I shall refuse to say to the country that I have lost my sympathy for the Civil War veterans, and on the claim of economy or other needless ground will vote to exclude them from their home to make room for other soldiers of other wars. We can take care of them in a different way without taking the comforts of those veterans of the Civil War, and I shall therefore vote against the bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman has only one more speech.

Mr. GANDY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that nothing except absolute necessity would bring anyone to support this cruel proposition. When you come to think about taking away the home that the Government gave the 330 old veterans of the Union Army, now averaging 76 years of age, and scattering them over this country to find another home, I can think of hardly anything more pathetic. I can not believe that the soldiers of the splendid armies that we have enlisted in this war can desire to do such a cruel thing as that. I know that the people of the United States will give, and I know that every man on both sides of this House will give, every dollar necessary to furnish all the hospital facilities that may be needed for the boys who come back incapacitated, injured, wounded, or diseased because of their services in this war, but that does not require us to be guilty of this almost supreme act of cruelty and injustice to the old soldiers of the Civil War. Why, gentlemen, I am surprised that men could for a moment entertain it. Why, gentlemen here who presented this bill say that this bill is for the purpose of removing these soldiers and finding them another good place, but they do not tell us where, they do not tell us how, they do not tell us under what circumstances these good places are to be found.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield.

Mr. GANDY. I did say in my opening statement that the soldiers' home board have almost a thousand vacant beds in the soldiers' home at Danville, Ill., that they expect in part to utilize.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know whether that statement is justified or not; I do not mean to impugn the gentleman's statement.

Mr. GANDY. I want to say——

Mr. TOWNER. I have not any testimony of that kind, and the gentleman knows very well that it is impossible to remove these men and make them satisfied with the removal. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as the gentleman may desire to my colleague from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret very much that any talk of disagreement between the veterans of any war which has been conducted by the United States is to creep into the discussion of this bill, because I know well and can speak with authority when I say that any injustice that was contemplated or about to be committed toward any of the veterans of any previous war would be resented by the veterans of this war more than by any other portion of the citizens of the United States. [Applause.] There is no attempt being made in this bill to perpetrate any act of cruelty toward any individual or veteran of any war. The facts are these: In the United States at the present time we have many soldiers' homes and sanatoriums. None of them are running to capacity. It is necessary to consolidate into these hospitals the veterans of different wars because you can not take the veteran of 80 years of age and place him in the same home or sanatorium with the 20-year boy who comes back a veteran of this war. You can not unite youth and age. They desire different things; they desire different food; they need different treatment; and all the War Department desires to do, that the board of managers desire to do, is to separate these men, send them to good, clean, decent institutions, to treat them as they should be treated. I indorse the statements which were made by my colleague from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY], because I believe that they can be verified from the record. One question was asked the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY], which is answered by the letter from the Secretary of War where he says:

> The managers of the home have expressed a desire to transfer it to the Medical Department for war purposes, and the Medical Department has caused an inspection to be made thereof and desires it for more or less permanent use as a general hospital. The only expense will be that required for maintenance on account of tear, wear, and ca.e

I want to say to you now that coming back on the transports you will find thousands and thousands of men who have been gassed, and they require different treatment and a different climate than the veterans of the Civil War or the other men who have been wounded in the war which we think has just ended, and I believe that the climate of the Northwest or the climate of Arizona or New Mexico is the one that will afford them the best opportunity for the care that they need in order that they can again become useful citizens of this country.

You can not send them to a hospital with the veterans of other wars. And the matter brings itself down to plain, common, ordinary sense: Will we utilize the hospitals that we have, treat every veteran of every war exactly as he should be treated, or shall we allow these hospitals to run at half capacity and then spend millions of dollars in the building, equipment, and maintenance of new ones?

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. EMERSON. It seems to me our responsibility in this matter comes to this point: If those old soldiers were sent to this sanitarium, or whatever you call it, because of certain diseases from which they were suffering, they would be benefited by that climate. If that is true, they should remain there. If it is not true, it is another question.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will state that immediately across the canyon from this home is the State soldiers' home, where we have the same conditions and, in my opinion, a better home than the Government home, with space for 74 of them. The Medical Department has agreed that 37 of these men, perhaps, should be left at this sanitarium. They must be left at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium. At least 74 of them can be and will be accommodated at Government expense in the South Dakota home for a sanitarium.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I desire to ask this question. You have stated in effect that old men and young men can not be kept together. The Grand Army of the Republic in a sense has looked upon the members of the present Army as their sons. Do you know of any reason why a father can not be associated with his sons? [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not, sir; and the cases are not analogous. I would call the gentleman's attention to the fact that these men that are coming back must be maintained in some institution with discipline, while we do not and will not discipline the men who fought in that great war where you took your great part, sir.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. If they need discipline, they ought not to be in a hospital, in my judgment.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am stating only the fact as to what is necessary.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will.

Mr. DYER. The soldiers of whom he speaks, of the present war, have not been discharged and will not be discharged or sent to their homes probably until they are cured.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly not. They are still in the military service and must be under military discipline, while we have removed every vestige of military discipline from the sanitariums where the veterans of the Civil War are kept. They have fought their fight, and we have no desire to impose any manner of hardship upon them.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing this bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 56.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEFLIN. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. It is an automatic call. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 161, nays 92, answered "present" 3, not voting 174, as follows:

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, as I was remarking, as a member of the committee that reported the bill, I feel it my duty to make some observations against it, and I want to crave the indulgence of the Senate during this discharge of probably the last important function I shall render as a Member of this body.

Involved in the consideration of this proposition are so many issues preceding the war, or our entrance into it, involving our own conduct in the war and involving the conclusion of a peace, that I can not, according to my point of view, discuss the pending measure without some latitude of debate.

If I had believed, as other Senators doubtless did, that this country entered the European war in order to democratize the world, or in order to make the world safe for democracy, or for any other high-sounding platitudinal reason such as that, it might be that I could convince myself that I ought to support this measure, but knowing that when impartial history is written the verdict can be nothing else on earth except the sheer, cold, naked truth that we entered the war for one reason and for one reason alone, namely, because the American flag was fired upon and American citizens were murdered upon the high seas, I can not lend my support to a proposition of this kind, so violative of fundamental American principles, so unwarranted from the standpoint of future evils that it will breed, and so indefensible from the standpoint that we are supposed to be honest custodians of the money of the taxpayers of this Republic.

Mr. President, why did we enter this war? I call the attention of the Members of this body to the fact that on August 19, 1914, soon after the European war had begun, the President of the United States proclaimed the strict and impartial neutrality of this country in a most remarkable state document. I can not at this moment lay my hands on the exact words of the proclamation, but its substance was that this country had nothing whatever to do with the struggle then beginning in Europe, that its causes were foreign to our interests and to our people, and the American people, drawn from many sources, were advised to keep strictly neutral in the matter and to avoid taking sides even in a conversational way in any passionate manner.

Again, in his second annual message to the Congress of the United States delivered December 8, 1914, five months after the war had begun, the President gave expression to a similar sentiment. He said:

> We are at peace with all the world. No one who speaks counsel based on fact or drawn from a just and candid interpretation of realities can say that there is any reason to fear that from any quarter our independence or the integrity of our territory is threatened. Dread of the power of any other nation we are incapable of. We are not jealous of rivalry in the fields of commerce or of any other peaceful achievement. We mean to live our own lives as we will; but we mean also to let live. We are, indeed, a true friend to all the nations of the world, because we threaten none, covet the possessions of none, desire the overthrow of none. Our friendship can be accepted and is accepted without reservation, because it is offered in a spirit and for a purpose which no one need ever question or suspect. Therein lies our greatness. We are champions of peace and of concord. And we should be very jealous of this distinction which we have sought to earn. Just now we should be particularly jealous of it, because it is our dearest present hope that this character and reputation may presently, in God's providence, bring us an opportunity such as has seldom been vouchsafed any nation, the opportunity to counsel and obtain peace in the world and reconciliation and a healing settlement of many a matter that has cooled and interrupted the friendship of nations. This is the time above all others when we should wish and resolve to keep our strength by self-possession, our influence by preserving our ancient principles of action.

After discussing the military policy, the proposition for a general enforced service, the President said:

> More than this—

That is, the volunteer system—

> More than this carries with it a reversal of the whole history and character of our polity. More than this, proposed at this time, permit me to say, would mean merely that we had lost our self-possession, that we had been thrown off our balance by a war with which we have nothing to do, whose causes can not touch us, whose very existence affords us opportunities of friendship and disinterested service which should make us ashamed of any thought of hostility or fearful preparation for trouble.

Again, in a speech delivered at Des Moines, Iowa, on February 1, 1916, President Wilson used this language:

> On the one hand there is a considerable body of men who are trying to stir the very sort of excitement in this country upon which every true, well-balanced American ought to frown. There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before, seek entanglement in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world.

In that same speech he gave expression to this sentiment:

> Every nation now engaged in the titanic struggle on the other side of the water believes, with an intensity of conviction that can not be exaggerated, that it is fighting for its rights, and in most instances that it is fighting for its life; and we must not be too critical of the men who lead those nations.

Such, Mr. President, truly and accurately voiced by the President of the United States, was the real policy of this country defined to be neutrality in accordance with its settled principles and in accordance with its unbroken practices in matters of this sort, and such, Mr. President, remained the policy of this country until dishonor of the American flag and a destruction of life of American citizens forced its abandonment. Let me proceed now to prove that proposition.

The time came when Germany's announced intention to resume an unrestricted submarine warfare; forced, and properly forced, let me say, in my opinion, a severance of our diplomatic relations with that country. In announcing that fact to Congress, Mr. Wilson said on February 3, 1917, addressing both Houses of Congress:

> I can not bring myself to believe that they—

Referring to the men who were administering the German Government—

> I can not bring myself to believe that they will, indeed, pay no regard to the ancient friendship between their people and our own, or to the solemn obligations which have exchanged between them and destroy American ships and take the lives of American citizens in the willful prosecution of the ruthless naval program they have announced their intention to adopt. Only actual overt acts on their part can make me believe it even now.

Again, when it proved unfortunately true that the Germans had committed the overt acts in question, had sunk three peaceful and peaceable American ships, two of which were not even within the war zone declared by the German Government, and all three of which were returning to this country empty and in ballast, President Wilson again addressed the American Congress, urging a declaration of war. I read now from what he then said:

> Just because we fight without rancor and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we shall wish to share with all free peoples—

That is, the freedom of the seas and the rights of neutral peoples—

> we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.
> I have said nothing of the governments allied with the Imperial Government of Germany, because they have not made war upon us or challenged us to defend our right and our honor. The Austro-Hungarian Government has, indeed, avowed its unqualified indorsement and acceptance of the reckless and lawless submarine warfare adopted now without disguise by the Imperial German Government, and it has therefore not been possible for this Government to receive Count Tarnowski, the ambassador recently accredited to this Government by the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria-Hungary; but that Government has not actually engaged in warfare against citizens of the United States on the seas, and I take the liberty, for the present at least, of postponing a discussion of our relations with the authorities at Vienna. We enter this war—

Mark it, Senators—

> only where we are clearly forced into it, because there are no other means of defending our rights

Mr. President, in spite of recent occurrences, it still remains written in the organic law of the Republic, the old and much-abused Constitution, that the power to declare war rests in the Congress of the United States and in it alone. Therefore, it becomes a matter of some importance to all men who profess to believe in any of the ancient principles what purpose the Congress had in view, what the object with which Congress went to war was.

I want to call attention to the fact that the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, by which this Congress declared war on Germany is couched in the following language:

Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Senators, when the prejudices and passions of this hour shall have passed away and when impartial history is written no candid or thoughtful man who has the slightest regard for the truth will ever again insist that this country entered this war to democratize the world or to make the world safe for democracy; that it entered this war for any reason on earth except that the German navy, acting under orders of the German Government, fired upon the American flag and murdered American citizens upon the high seas.

That was reason enough, and, for my part, I voted for that war unhesitatingly, just as I should have voted with no greater hesitation for war against England, or France, or Brazil, or Mexico, or any other power on the face of the earth, in Europe, Asia, or Africa, which, on the high seas, had fired on the American flag and murdered American citizens.

Now, the Senate, or those Senators who have kindly followed me so far in my argument, will, I think, be forced to concede in their own minds, at least, no matter what their votes may represent, that we did not enter this war for any other purpose except to vindicate American honor and to establish American rights. I say very frankly to the Senate that the only council table at which I wish to see the United States of America represented to-day is a council table at which full reparation shall be exacted for American wrongs and full guaranties required for American rights in the future.

So far as I am concerned, at least, I have not abandoned my belief in the ancient traditions of this country; so far as I am concerned, at least, I still believe that this country ought not to have entangling alliances in Europe; so far as I am concerned, Senators, if I were a Member of this body when the question came to be voted on here, I would stand here until I rotted before I would ever vote for a treaty that bound the United States of America to guarantee a single European boundary line or to guarantee the permanency or stability of any country that may be created by the peace congress now sitting in Paris.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will.

Mr. KING. The Senator has noted, doubtless, that the dispatches indicate the abandonment of a view alleged at an earlier day to have been entertained by some that a supernation would be created which would take from this Nation some of its sovereign powers and which doubtless would impose upon us an obligation to do some of the things to which the Senator has just adverted.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator. The Senator from Georgia has noted that with very great gratification. It is utterly impossible until the millenium shall arrive to create a league of nations to enforce peace unless we are to depart from nationalism and enter into the field of internationalism. Every nation must retain its own sovereign power. It is quite probable, however, I believe, that a strong agreement between all the parties signatory to this agreement that they will, so far as possible, arbitrate their differences with each other and with the remainder of the world, and the putting around such an agreement of every atom of moral force that the parties signatory can impose will have a great, powerful, and beneficent effect on the future of the world and may promote, or help to promote, the cause of peace in the decades that are yet to come. Beyond that nothing is possible; beyond that everything is foolish and absurd; and, for one, so long as I have a right to lift my voice in this Chamber, it shall not go out undisputed to the world that the only idea in America is that something more Utopian and less practicable than that is possible.

Mr. President, in view of what has actually happened in this country, it is impossible for me to understand the position now assumed and the position that has been taken in the past years, certainly since the time when we actually entered this war, not only by our President but by others high in authority in this country. If it be true that we entered the war to democratize the world, if it be true that we entered the war to make the world safe for democracy, if it be true that we entered the war because Germany was threatening our independence along with that of the remainder of the world, then I say deliberately to the American people that the United States of America acted the part of a laggard and a slacker every day since Belgian neutrality was first violated and this atrocious scheme began to work. If I had believed that, I would not have hesitated for a single moment to have declared war on Germany before she committed any overt act upon us or upon our people, even before the Lusitania was sunk, before she did anything except to begin the prosecution of what is now called "her nefarious scheme to subjugate the world." I did not believe it, and the people of this country did not believe it, because it has not been so many months since the majority of them reelected Mr. Wilson President of the United States on the single proposition that he kept us out of war.

I repeat, Mr. President, that in view of what has actually happended and the actual official record, it is remarkable to me to observe some of the positions that are now taken and that pass amongst loosely informed people abroad and in this country as the real, accurate, official position of America. Particularly, Mr. President, I have in mind a speech delivered by President Wilson at the entertainment given him by the city government of Paris at the Hotel de Ville a few weeks ago. President Wilson said this:

I beg that you will not suppose that because a wide ocean separated us in space we were not in effect eye witnesses of the shameful ruin that was wrought and the cruel and unnecessary suffering that were brought upon you. These sufferings have filled our hearts with indignation—

I do not take issue with him on that part of his speech, of course—

We know not only what they were, but we know what they signified, and our hearts were touched to the quick by them, our imaginations filled with the whole picture of what France and Belgium in particular had experienced.

When the United States entered the war, therefore, they entered it not only because they were moved by a conviction that the purposes of the central empires were wrong and must be resisted by men everywhere who loved liberty and the right, but also because the illicit ambitions which they were entertaining and attempting to realize had led to the practices which shocked our hearts as much as they offended our principles.

Mr. President, if the President were right in describing that as the position and the view of the American people, I wish to say that he indicts the people of America for a shameful species of slackerism, because years after the sufferings of Belgium and of France had actually happened the President was still saying that he knew nothing about the causes of this quarrel, had nothing to do with them; that we ought to stay out; and that it was not, as he put it, and as the Congress put it, until the Imperial Government of Germany committed an actual overt act against our flag and our people that we were forced to recognize a state of war that they had thrust upon us.

It is very important to draw these distinctions in view of the pending proposition, because if it be really true that the purpose of the American people in entering this war was to democracize the world, then, of course, I rather think that there might be some moral obligation, at least, to pay the way in cash for that sort of a proceeding.

It is most surprising that men should now entertain a view of that kind, although they once entertained and once expressed on the most solemn occasions and in the most solemn manner precisely the opposite view, and should now insist that that has become the duty of this country to send its money by untold millions to foreign lands in order to help create a democracy, which they afterwards hope to make safe for the world.

Mr. President, the most explicit statement of the reasons for which this money is asked will be found in the cablegram sent by President Wilson to his secretary, Mr. Tumulty, under date of January 11, 1919. Let me say that somehow or other it smacks just a little too much of the habits and customs and proceedings of royalty, according to my way of thinking, that this particular cablegram, conveying instructions to the Congress, should have been sent indirectly by our absent liege to his private secretary.

The telegram reads as follows:

PARIS, January 11, 1919.

TUMULTY.

The White House, Washington:

Please convey following confidential message to Senator MARTIN and Congressman SWAGAR SHERLEY—

Here is the message:

I can not too earnestly or solemnly urge upon the Congress the appropriation for which Mr. Hoover has asked for the administration of food relief. Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solution of peaces. Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, has overwhelmed Poland, and is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food, and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance. The money will not be spent for food for Germany itself, because Germany can buy its food, but it will be spent for financing the movement of food to our real friends in Poland and to the people of the liberated units of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and to our associates in the Balkans. I beg that you will present this matter with all possible urgency and force to the Congress. I do not see how we can find definite powers with whom to conclude peace unless this means of stemming the tide of anarchism be employed.

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. President, for one, and so far as America, at least, is concerned, I can not accept the view that having conquered a peace it is now necessary for us to proceed to buy a peace, and that this measure can either be advocated or defended on the theory or hypothesis that this is a war measure; that we have got to give these people whom we have conquered and who have surrendered to us a hundred million dollars to keep them from fighting us some more. If I thought that I would rather continue the war until we had them in a condition where they were not in any position to make any such demand as that, where they would be forced to concede what I thought they had already conceded—that they were conquered in this war and had to accept the terms we imposed.

It is therefore impossible for me to support this proposition on the ground that it is necessary for us to give them a hundred million dollars, after we have beaten them, in order to get them to conclude the peace for which they sued. Nor do I believe that it is necessary to appropriate this money in order to set up buffer States around Germany. I do not believe Germany is any such menace now, and I doubt if it ever has been any such menace, to the future independence of the world. It looks to me like the separatist movement in Germany has gained uncheckable force, and that probably the German Empire will be separated into many smaller States. If so, there will be no danger whatever of any war that any one of those States might wage against the balance of the world.

Mr. President, I can not think that it is right for us to send this money as a matter of charity, and I will tell the Senate why.

We must realize, Senators, that this is a mere drop in the bucket. As one of my neighbors suggests, if these people get hungry again they will want more money, and if they get hungry still more they will want still more money; and I imagine the oftener we yield to demands of that sort the more certain future demands of that character are to be repeated upon us. It is only the beginning; and the remarkable part about it is that we, who went into this war simply and solely because our flag was fired upon and American citizens were murdered upon the high seas, and who have no connection with—or ought not to have, at least—and no concern in the internal affairs of Europe, are to be called upon to bear the brunt of this proceeding over there.

I heard with care and interest the gentlemen who presented this proposition to the committee, Mr. Hoover's counsel—I think his name was Mr. Glasgow—and some other gentleman, and the Secretary of the Treasury, who lent his presence there, although he said very little.

These gentlemen said—we pinned them down to the point—that France and England had agreed to participate in this movement. We begged them to tell us how much they had agreed to contribute. They did not know. They said that Italy would do the best she could, they hoped, but she was not definitely committed. "Well," we said, "why should they not say in advance what the amount of their contribution is, before we make ours?" They said, "Well, that would not do; that would be casting some sort of a reflection on the good faith of these countries," and that we must come forward first and contribute our $100,000,000 before we even asked them how much they would give. Now, that is the plain truth about what happened and what was testified before the committee by these gentlemen.

Senators, that is an unbusinesslike way to go at it. These people over there on the ground, on the Continent of Europe and adjacent to it, certainly owe the first obligation, if anybody owes an obligation, in respect to a matter of this sort; and I think the cart is put decidedly and distinctly before the horse when we are compelled, by cable orders from over there, to say first the amount of our appropriation and to make first the actual appropriation from the Treasury itself. No one of them has taken any official action about it, and no one of them has even presented to its congress or its parliament the proposition in an official form asking for the granting of money from the public treasury.

Besides, if it be charity, Mr. President—and few men have had harder experiences in the world than I have had, and I believe there is no man in this Senate whose heart is touched more quickly and more deeply than mine is by that appeal, from whatever part of this world it comes—if it be charity, then I insist that charity begins at home. I would not be willing to vote a single dollar out of the Treasury of the United States to send to Europe or Asia Minor or anywhere else on this earth as long as there was a single suffering child in this country that needed food or needed help, as long as there was a single individual in this country, no matter whether his condition resulted from his own fault or not—and that is true over there, too—who was hungry and could not get food, who was starving and could not be relieved; and it is a fact that in all the great cities of the country, even in the most prosperous years, our people here in America starve by the thousands—usually, I admit, because of their own faults and vices.

Why, it is not so long ago since the secretary of a great committee in New York, our greatest city—I think it was only yesterday or day before yesterday—reported that in that city thousands and thousands of children died every single year, and he stated 30,000, I think—I do not want to state that certainly, because I do not remember the exact figures—as the number that had died this past year for lack of proper nutrition. I think, if we are going into this charity business, we had better send some of that money up there to relieve those poor little children who are dying from lack of nutrition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me just a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to have the Senator indicate what answer the Congress of the United States could make to the American people, hundreds and thousands of them, who are suffering for the necessaries of life, if they should come to Congress and ask for an appropriation of a hundred million dollars to ameliorate their suffering.

Only a few days ago I read in the public prints the account of a thousand or fifteen hundred men, including 400 recently discharged American soldiers, who called upon the mayor of the city of Boston—one of the richest and greatest cities in this Republic—demanding employment, demanding that they be given some means by which they might provide their wives and children with the vital necessaries of life. What are you going to do with appeals of that character if this money is to be sent to Europe? I grant that it may be sent there for the purpose of ameliorating human suffering—suffering that touches me very deeply—but I agree with the Senator from Georgia that charity begins at home, and until we take care of our own people I think we had better be careful about how we levy taxes upon these people for the purpose of raising money to meet the emergency there.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the suggestion; and I had intended before I concluded these remarks to cover fully that phase of the question, or at least to do so as fully as I am capable of doing so.

This is not put by the President on the ground of charity, however. It is a political proposition, to check the spread of Bolshevism in Europe.

Mr. President, how long will it be before we shall be treated to a similar demand in this country? We have to-day our American Bolsheviki. I think Members of this body are pretty well agreed that the Industrial Workers of the World are in close alliance with the Bolsheviki, and practically represent and typify the same sentiments and the same movements; and yet we have not treated our American Bolsheviki in that spirit during this struggle.

Mr. VARDAMAN. We shoot them.

Mr. HARDWICK. We have shot them and jailed them and done a few other necessary things, I think, in order to keep them right and keep them within the bounds of the law; but we are to employ different methods in Europe toward foreign Bolsheviki.

Senators, I predict now—and I believe I can see it with the clearness of a vision that is almost prophetic in these closing hours of my service—that once you grant this demand on the ground upon which it is based, the time is not far distant, in the industrial throes that will accompany and follow reconstruction, when a similar demand will be made on you by American Bolsheviki here at home.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator, with pleasure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to what the Senator has said, and I assent to some of the views to which he has given expression. To others of his views I can not assent. I think the statement of the Senator, as I interpreted that statement, that the President sought this appropriation for the purpose of stemming bolshevism, and the subsequent statement of the Senator, as I interpreted it, that the money was to be given to the Bolsheviks, is scarcely warranted from the attitude of the President. Let me say that if I thought the President of the United States would give one single penny of this $100,000,000 to the murderous scoundrels known as the Bolsheviks, who are trying to destroy all forms of government and by assassination and terror and unspeakable atrocities are seeking the destruction of millions of the Russian people, I would never vote for the appropriation.

As I understand the position of the President it is that the expenditure of this money in certain sections of Europe where there is poverty and want will enable the people who are not Bolsheviks to resist the advances of Bolshevism, to erect stable governments which will aid the purposes of the war upon which we entered, and more quickly terminate it, and enable the belligerent nations to conclude peace and pacify Europe. The accomplishment of these ends will enable us to bring back much sooner our troops to our own shores.

I think this appropriation can be justified, not upon the ground of charity, but upon the ground of its being a war necessity. It is costing the United States perhaps $100,000,000 a week—these figures are a hasty guess and may be much too high, but at any rate an enormous figure—to maintain our Army there in Europe. If this expenditure of $100,000,000 will return our soldiers to the United States 10 days sooner we will be fully compensated. It is my opinion that the expenditure of this $100,000,000 for war purposes—that is, in feeding peoples and equipping those who are fighting Bolshevism and Germany and German intrigue—the situation in central Europe will so improve that we may be enabled thereby to return our soldiers to the United States weeks if not months sooner than otherwise would be the case.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, answering the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah, permit me to say that I did not intend—and I hope the Senator will not so understand it—to put the President of the United States in any attitude. I merely read the exact language of his cablegram to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. If the Senator desires me to do it, I will repeat that language.

Mr. KING. Pardon me; I remember the language very well.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will not repeat it, then. The President says it is to check the spread of Bolshevism. It is to be sent to Russia. The act authorizes it.

Mr. KING. Speaking for myself, I wish some of it were to be sent to Russia and given to Admiral Colchak and to the Czecho-Slovaks, who are in the eastern part of Russia and the western part of Siberia, in order, first, to protect the Czecho-Slovaks and the Russian armies who are our allies, and also to destroy Bolshevism, or destroy its further advance to the east, and to that extent more quickly pacify Europe. Of course, I have in mind the fact that the Bolshevist military forces are in part German, Austrian, Hungarian, and Chinese mercenaries and bands of criminals, all of whom are enemies of the United States and the allied powers.

Mr. HARDWICK. If sent to Russia there is no man so wise when sent to distribute this relief who would know whether it was given to a Bolshevist or not. The Senator, expressing a desire that it should be sent there, would find that in all human probability and without any fault of administration millions of this money would go to the very people to whom he said he would not give a penny. But it is to appropriate money to check the spread of Bolshevism in Europe, and that is what the President said.

Now, when reconstruction comes in this country, when conditions here are met, when readjustment takes place, what will happen? Unless prices go down the average American citizen, particularly in cities and towns, will not be able to live; he can not earn an honest living. The clerks and smaller salaried people in all the towns and cities to-day are struggling under an overwhelming load of debt. Prices can not go down unless to some extent, at least, the cost of labor goes down with them. We had just as well face this question like men. We know that. When it happens you will have not only the Industrial Workers of the World, but the American Federation of Labor, in all probability, and its kindred and allied forces—because we have already been given official notice of that fact by its leader, Mr. Gompers—arrayed in a death struggle against the Government and against the balance of the country. They say that under no circumstances shall the price of wages go down.

In time industrial unrest, troubles of all sorts, will bring financial suffering in this country, just as certain as to-morrow's sun shall rise again and set. When that day comes it will be difficult for the Senator from Utah or any other Senator in this body who supports this proposition, no matter what reason he gives for it, to escape the overwhelming, powerful point that, having sent millions to people who are suffering in Europe, you are now unwilling to spend millions upon your own suffering people in this country.

I do not agree with the suggestion of my friend from Utah that we will save a great deal of money, because we will get our forces home sooner if we vote this money and stabilize things, because, as I see it, and I hope it will be the policy of this Government and this country, our soldiers are not to be employed and ought not to be employed in policing Europe, now that peace has come.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated in the beginning of his remarks, and very properly, too, that he thought or hoped that there might be some agreement—that was his expression—that would reduce the possibilities of war and permit arbitration in certain matters.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I said that.

Mr. KING. In justiciable matters, I suppose. The Senator also said that we should have guaranties, that we should at the peace table insist upon reparation or indemnity for certain wrongs which we had received and guaranties at the hands of Germany. Of course the Senator expects that other nations, our allies, will demand——

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, we have had no allies in this war.

Mr. KING. I recognize those people with whom we have been fighting as our allies, but if the Senator does not like the word "allies" I will say those with whom we have been associated in this great war.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is better.

Mr. KING. As I was about to say, the Senator must recognize that those with whom we have been associated are entitled likewise to demand guaranties at the hands of the central empires, guaranties of peace, guaranties of indemnity, guaranties that whatever is exacted to be done shall be performed. Manifestly we can not scuttle out of Europe now; that we must remain there at least until the terms of peace have been signed and it becomes manifest that the guaranties demanded shall be complied with.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me say to the Senator from Utah that our own splendid response to the demands the situation put upon us has demonstrated our ability to defend our rights on the high seas so thoroughly to all the world and to avenge the wrongs committed against our people that we have furnished our own best guaranty against the repetition of any such conduct on the part of any nation on earth. No guaranty which could come from a mere agreement in writing would be one-half, yea, one-thousandth, part so potent a guaranty as that which comes from the fact that the nations of the earth know now at least that we are able to protect and maintain and assert our rights. So far as guaranties that France will get back Alsace-Lorraine and that Italy shall receive territory from the Austrian powers or anything of that sort is concerned, if it is done anywhere in Europe, I have no part or parcel in transactions of that sort myself.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows we can not negotiate peace with Germany and with Austria until there are governments there with whom we can deal and which, at least for the time being, are competent to discharge national and international obligations. Certainly it would not be the honorable thing for this Nation and those with whom it has been associated to destroy Germany, to destroy Austria, and to leave them in a weltering mass, while the former sit around the peace table and impose terms that they are not, because they have no government, competent to discharge. It is our duty, it seems to me, to stay sufficiently long in Europe to end the war and negotiate a treaty of peace with governments de jure or de facto, governments with whom we can deal and from whom we may demand guaranties and indemnities.

Mr. HARDWICK. If I could accept the rather loose statements of my friend—and I characterize them in that way with all good temper—perhaps I could feel some of the same sentiments he has just expressed. But the fact is there are de facto governments at least, and probably de jure governments, in Germany and Austria-Hungary. The fact is they are so much governments that we have accepted their assent to the armistice terms and to an amendment of the armistice terms. The fact is further that the Senator from Utah is not asked to give this money to German or Austrian people. In fact, Senators on this floor have expressed the sentiment that they would not vote for it if a single penny of it went to Germany or Austria. So it seems to me the Senator's position is utterly untenable from every point of view.

This can not be regarded as a war appropriation. I would hate to say on the floor of this body on this occasion, that has something of solemnity in it to me, what I think the real purpose of this appropriation is; but whatever its purpose, whether it is world politics we are called upon to play with a campaign fund of this kind or whether it is charity for the Bolsheviki or to check Bolshevism, or whether for final peace that we have led our people to believe we have conquered, I can find no excuse from my point of view to support it.

Mr. President, I admit, nay, I take pride in the fact, that I am somewhat old-fashioned in my views about government. It may be said, and said with some degree of truth, that I belong to a somewhat old-fashioned southern school. I believe in a written Constitution. I believe in a strict interpretation of it. I believe in a government of delegated powers. I believe in the dual system of our Government. I believe in the great doctrine of local self-government. I believe that Washington and Jefferson, and all of the fathers of the Republic, were right when they builded and that they builded aright, and I believe that unless we leave and abandon this mad saturnalia of imperialism and autocracy here at home and return to the ancient principles of our fathers there will be no safety nor happiness for the people of this Republic.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] in opening this debate pointed out the fact that on six or seven different occasions the Government of the United States in the face of great national calamity abroad, and of great disturbances here once or twice, I think, has contributed money out of the Public Treasury that belongs to the taxpayers of the United States to relieve human suffering. Mr. President, it is needless for me to say that on no one of those occasions, since my service of 16 years in the Congress of the United States has continued, have I ever given my assent to the soundness or correctness of that view.

To-day, when I am perfectly disinterested and when I have no motive on this earth to serve except that of truth as I see it, to help the American people and the American Senate, if I can, to the limit of my poor power, I would say that if I had ever supported such a proposition I had erred and erred grievously, because, while charity is all right, charity ought not to be indulged in by the Federal Government under any circumstances. The local governments can do it under forms of law through their poorhouses and poor rates, and through their intimate acquaintance with persons and individuals enable local administrators to deal out relief which suffering humanity requires with discrimination; but for the Federal Government to embark on an enterprise of that character is foreign to the purpose for which it is created and can never lead to anything but mischievous results.

If we are going to contribute the money of the taxpayers of this country by the hundreds of millions of dollars to relieve organized Bolshevism in Europe, or calamity anywhere else on this earth, then we are forcing the men of substance of this country, through the machinery of taxation, to give their money in charity instead of letting them exercise their own option about it. It is not a proper function of the Government to do it. Charity begins at home. If we ought to appropriate to relieve human suffering and take the charity proposition abroad, whoever again in this body can withstand the cry that we are bound by every law of fairness and justice to our own to first relieve the human suffering in this land of ours? Who can dispute it? Who can withstand it? Who can deny it? Who can resist it?

When we do it we have surrendered the very citadel of individualism to socialists and to anarchists and to the Bolsheviki. When we say that men who have labored and toiled and denied themselves in order to accumulate substance and to insure happiness for their families shall be compelled under forms of law and by the machinery of the Federal Government to give up their plenty to those who have not, you have at last reached the era of a common state and of a pot into which every man's assets are thrown, that are advocated by those very people whom you say you are fighting.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KING. If I vote for this $100,000,000 appropriation, I shall do so very reluctantly, but if it were to be rested upon the ground of a charity I should not vote for it. I share the views of the distinguished Senator from Georgia. If it can not be based upon the ground that it is necessary for war purposes and as a necessary means for terminating the war and thus sooner returning our soldiers, then, in my view, it can not rest upon any ground that is defensible.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator for that statement. It but confirms the high opinion I have for both his intelligence and his integrity.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to give to the Senate at greater length than I expected the reasons which led me to oppose this proposition. Permit me now for about 5 or 10 minutes at the outside to say a few words that are more or less personal in concluding what shall probably be, as far as I can now see, my last address of any length to this body, at the conclusion of a public service of 16 years in the Congress of the United States.

During the troublesome war period from which we are emerging I have had many serious and grievous differences of opinion with a majority of my associates on this floor and with distinguished officials of the Government outside of this Chamber. When we entered the war I believed with all the fervor and strength of my nature that a democracy could fight a great war without surrendering its cardinal and fundamental principles. I believed that free government could wage a great war as successfully as a despotic and autocratic power could. Therefore I was unable, with the utmost love of this country in my heart, to support such propositions as an enforced military service across the sea. I believe that our people under the volunteer system would have given to the flag and to the country an ample support, and I knew that if we had the same percentage of volunteers in this country that Canada furnished and that Australia furnished we should in less than three years raise an army of 5,000,000 Americans to defend the honor and the flag of this country.

Other Senators felt otherwise and still feel otherwise on this question. With them I have no quarrel, because their view is just as honest as mine. It is merely an honest difference of opinion. I believe with all the force and fervor and power of my nature that it was unnecessary to undertake to write price control into the statute and to have food control in this country, and I therefore opposed those propositions. While I do not like to put myself in the invidious position of saying "I told you so," I do say when you come to pay the bills for 1920 wheat you will wonder if it would not have been better to rely on our laws against forestalling trade, engrossing, and profiteering, to provide millions, if necessary, for the enforcement of those laws, and to strengthen them to the utmost limit of the power that resided in the Congress of the United States for that purpose, rather than undertake to reverse every economic law, to undo every economic principle, and to fly in the face of every economic truth established by the history of the world.

Mr. President, I have some feeling upon this question. It is not personal. It is wholly impersonal. Whatever my career in this body has been, no living man can truthfully say it has not been an honest one; that it has not been an open one; that it has not been a frank one; that it has not been a fearless one. I have felt that I have stood for great American principles. I have felt that I stood for great American fundamentals. I have felt that the fathers of this Republic builded aright when they laid its foundations on what I regard as principles of eternal truth, and I pray that the Senators who will remain here after I have gone, and who are to meet the responsibilities of a new and, if possible, graver hour when this period of reconstruction shall come, will return once more to the ancient principles of the fathers, for therein lies the only hope of honor, safety, and happiness for the people of this Republic, that we all love.

Mr. PENROSE. I submit the following amendment to the pending bill, to which I earnestly invite the attention of the Senator from Virginia having the bill in charge. If he would accept this amendment, it would make it comparatively easy, in my opinion, to get a reasonably unanimous support for the measure.

The chief opposition to the measure is the lack of information which the Senate has as to the needs or the purposes of this very large appropriation, just about the time when the slogan appeared to be "retrenchment and economy," and the loose, irresponsible, and nebulous way in which it is to be administered.

I offer this amendment as a further proviso, at the end of line 10, page 2 of the bill, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the words "already adopted," at line 10, page 2, insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, who shall receive an annual salary of $10,000 and traveling expenses, to administer and defray all expenditures authorized by this act, under the direction of the President.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, no Senator, I take it, has any objection to making an appropriation for any amount to be expended by the President if the President actually superintended the expenditure. But such is not the case, and can not be the case. It is impossible for the President to attend to the many matters he has undertaken to do and superintend the distribution of these funds. During the war period we made such appropriations, and what was the result? We had the delegation of the presidential power reposed in the hands of unknown and irresponsible autocrats, holding no obligation of an official oath to the Government, with no defined power and status, and expending millions of dollars. Hence the aeroplane scandal; hence the universal complaint against the fuel autocracy and the food autocracy.

These abuses and evils, Mr. President, were tolerated during the war, when every patriotic citizen was willing to send his son to Europe to make the supreme sacrifice, if need be, and to the limit of his ability not only to pay the taxes but to subscribe to the liberty loans. We are drawing rapidly, I hope, into a condition of peace, the Army is being gradually disbanded, and why should we not again proceed to administer the affairs of the Government in an orderly way?

I shall not discuss the qualifications of Mr. Hoover, but he certainly has no relation to the American Government or no official status to arouse any degree of confidence as to how he shall expend this money. How can he be called to account for it? He may never return to the United States. He has been living in England all his life; he owns a palatial establishment there; and more than likely, with the close of the war, he will resume his residence in that island among those congenial foreign surroundings. His name was never sent to the Senate as food administrator.

Mr. President, I do not exaggerate when I state that among the tens of thousands of business men in Pennsylvania, retail merchants in every trade, dealers and jobbers in every commodity, there is a universal outcry of dissent against the administration of the Food Department during the war period. Vexatious and harassing rules and regulations were issued continually, only to be revoked within a week or ten days, on account of their very absurdity. I know what I am talking about when I state that not only in Pennsylvania but from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean the condemnation is universal.

If this amendment is accepted by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and is adopted by the Senate, I believe that nearly every Senator can afford to vote for this bill. I have no information as to whether this appropriation is needed or not. I talked to a Member of the other House yesterday who has been three weeks in Belgium and who is a careful observer. He told me that food was abundant in Belgium and that the prices were not very much higher than they are at the average hotel in New York City or in Washington, probably not so high as in some of the hotels in Washington.

Just how the money is to be applied we are entirely in the dark about. However, I will not argue that point. I am willing to trust the President, who has by wireless telegraphy in some vague way informed the Congress that the money is needed and can be profitably spent; but I do object, Mr. President, to having a nonresident of the United States, who may never return to this country again, to be within reach of a subpœna of Congress—and there will be subpœnas after the 4th of March, Mr. President, issued to the heads of departments—made the trustee of this fund.

I have no sympathy with the proposition that the money shall be expended by some international agency. I have not, Mr. President, made a sufficient advance in the direction of a league of nations to feel that the money of the American taxpayer should be spent by anybody but American officials; and I have no sympathy with the proposition that it is to be expended under the authority of delegates from England, France, and Italy, and, for aught I know, from Siam and Montenegro, under the sympathetic supervision of Mr. Hoover, who can hardly claim to be an American and who may never return to this country.

That is what the American people criticize. My mail is laden every morning—and in the last three or four days it is beginning to rise in quite a strong tide—with expressions of sentiment against the pending revenue bill. People argue, Why should the taxpayer have these enormous and burdensome taxes, which threaten the stagnation of industry, if not its paralysis, imposed upon them if we are to indulge in every absurdity that enters the brain of the theorist and the impractical bureaucrat? If there is starvation in Europe, this hundred million dollars will be but a drop in the bucket; if there is no starvation there, it is simply an appropriation to bolster up and exploit the activities of Mr. Hoover and of some other unauthorized agencies.

In my opinion, Mr. President, within a not unreasonable time there will be sufficient food in Europe for the populations there, except in those countries where the Bolshevik spirit prevails, where lawlessness and riot abound, and where the people are too demoralized and lazy to take advantage of the resources of the country, and the quickest way to cure that condition is to let it run its course.

I think the amendment, Mr. President, speaks so entirely for itself that I shall not detain the Senate by speaking at any length. The fact remains that, notwithstanding we have no information concerning the necessity of this appropriation, notwithstanding the fact that it is only the forerunner of hundreds of millions of dollars more that are coming along for a lot of fantastic projects, I still would be willing to vote for the measure—and I believe a considerable number of other Senators would be willing to vote for it—if it is safeguarded in some way along legitimate lines. Therefore I sincerely hope, in the interest of the measure itself, that the Senator from Virginia will accept this amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there are several ways of opposing a bill in the United States Senate. One is by a frontal attack; one is by a flank attack; and one is by poison gas. I refer to poison gas because the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who honors us with his presence here to-day for a few moments, has referred to the subpœnas that will be issued after the 4th of March. I believe subpœnas will be issued. I know subpœnas have already been issued for Mr. Hoover, and that Mr. Hoover has already testified at considerable length before a distinguished committee of the Senate.

The flank attacks that are made by amendments to measures pending here are sometimes made by friends of the measures. We had an instance only last week, when the salaries of judges in the Federal courts were placed by their friends so high that the passage of the bill would not have been secured had they not been reduced.

Frontal attacks I have no objection to, and I am certain that when this bill comes to a vote on the merits it will be successful. Personally I was very sorry when the amendment, offered with the highest motives, by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was adopted, for I can not myself see the difference between feeding a starving enemy after the war is over and feeding a starving friend. The Germans are referred to, and justly so, in terms of the bitterest hate. They are called murderers and poisoners and violators of women. The charges are true; but there have been men who have been guilty of those things in the United States, who have been duly convicted by juries, and who have been executed; but we do not starve such men. We feed them; and, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] suggests, we do not starve their families. We feed them, and then put them to death in as dignified a way as the law can invent.

I was on the Argonne front when the armistice went into effect. I heard the last guns fired there. I went out with the commanding general when the dead were still lying on the ground, and we met——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I decline to yield.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator just made a misstatement about me, and I did not know whether he cared to have it contradicted.

Mr. HOLLIS. Well, the Senator can contradict it in his own time.

Mr. PENROSE. I will take the opportunity to do so.

Mr. HOLLIS. I decline to yield at this time.

We met 200 German prisoners being brought in from the front. These were the murderers and the poisoners and the violators, if such they be; but those men were not starved to death; those men were fed and fed liberally; they were probably fed better than they had been fed for weeks.

If Germans are to starve it will not be the men who are responsible for this war. The men who are responsible for the war and its infamies are getting well fed three times a day, and they have been well fed all through the war. The ones who are to starve are the poor people who were misguided and misled, the people who have suffered, the people whose families have been in poverty, and whose brothers and fathers and sons have been killed because of the misguiding on the part of those responsible for the war. I am, therefore, sorry that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and accepted, was put upon the bill, because I can clearly see that money expended even in Germany might do very much to put down the rising terror of Bolshevism and to bring the war to an earlier conclusion.

There have been several interallied councils in Europe during the past few months. There have been councils on finance, on shipping, on food, on war trade, on war industries, munitions, and war operations. It was not until we had a supreme interallied council on war operations that the war was brought to a successful close. After the armistice was signed these various interallied councils for the conduct of the fighting came to an end and a single supreme council on relief and supplies was created. The President of the United States appointed two members to represent this country on that council. France, England, and Italy also appointed members to that supreme council. England appointed Lord Reading, the ambassador to the United States, and one of the greatest, most efficient, and most trusted of English statesmen. The other English member was Sir John Beale, about whom I do not know. France appointed M. Clementel, the minister of commerce, one of the leading members of the Clemenceau cabinet. The second member was M. Vilgrain, whom I do not know. I have forgotten the names of the Italian members; but the two members appointed by the President were Mr. Hoover and Mr. Davis.

There has been considerable difference of opinion in the Senate about Mr. Hoover. I never met Mr. Hoover personally until last July when he was in England. I think it is safe to say that there is no American who enjoys more the confidence of the people of Europe than does Mr. Hoover. In this country Mr. Hoover has done a great work. I think it may be subject to some just criticism, but Mr. Hoover has succeeded in making economy fashionable in the United States; he has got the people to save food voluntarily, without compulsion; and I think the people of America will have confidence that Mr. Hoover will spend this money properly and justly. I do not apologize for Mr. Hoover, and he needs no defense from me.

I do know intimately Mr. Norman H. Davis, the other man appointed by President Wilson. Mr. Davis is a native of Tennessee, and his brother was elected a Member of Congress from Tennessee in the last election. Mr. Davis is a prominent banker in this country, and he is known to prominent bankers all over the world. He has been working in the Treasury Department for the last 16 months as an expert on foreign exchange and foreign loans. He went to Spain in the month of August as special financial commissioner from the United States to arrange a loan in order to bring the Spanish rate of exchange back as nearly as possible to normal. He borrowed 250,000,000 pesetas from the Spanish banks at 5½ per cent. The Bank of England tried to borrow pesetas in Spain a year ago next spring and failed. The French borrowed money there, paid 8½ per cent, and took one-third of it in wine and fruit, which they did not need. After Mr. Davis succeeded in making this loan in Spain Lord Cunliffe, the president of the Bank of England, stated it was the best piece of financial work that has been done in Europe since the war began. Mr. Davis is a trusted representative of the United States Treasury. I do not know the facts about it, but I think he was appointed purposely so that our money would be carefully safeguarded.

I am aware that there has been a feeling among some of the Senators that our public men in Europe were somewhat free in their expenditures. There may be some justice in those charges in some cases; but when a great war is on you can not be too particular about expenditures. War is a most extravagant and expensive business at best. I do not think Mr. Hoover would be unduly extravagant with this money, but I know that, so long as Mr. Davis is associated with him, the money will be wisely and humanely disposed of.

There is great necessity for food in central Europe. As soon as the war was over it was found that one of the controlling causes for bringing about the armistice was the lack of food in Germany, in Austria, and in the surrounding countries. The armistice was signed, and the cry went up all over Europe that people were starving. What was this country to do in that condition? The President told Mr. Hoover to furnish food. Mr. Hoover was informed that in Vienna there was money available so that he could sell wheat that belonged to the food corporation. He did not trust to that report but sent an agent immediately, at some risk to his life, and the agent reported that the statement was not true; that they could not pay for it. There was no money at the disposal of our President or our Government with which to buy food to send them.

England and France work on a different basis. They have money at their disposal for emergencies. The Cabinet has money that it can spend, and it had money to spend at that time. Mr. Hoover's position was that so long as 80 per cent of the food was coming from the United States, the United States should have the control and direction of where the food was to go; but it appeared that France and England were the only Governments at that time that had money to furnish to pay for this food, and it appeared that England was in control of the ships that must be used to send the food to Europe. So a cooperative plan was worked out, and Mr. Hoover was invited to become the director general of the interallied council. Whether Mr. Hoover be worthy or unworthy, our associates in Europe believe that he is worthy, and with any other representative on that council it is sure that the director general would not be an American; that is, I feel confident of that.

I have talked with those who have informed themselves about the wheat supply, and I am satisfied that there is a very large surplus of wheat now in the world. It has not been possible to bring the wheat from Australia or in large quantities from the Argentine during the war. Wheat in Australia has been rotting, has been spoiling. It is practically worthless because of lack of transportation. As the English send the Australian soldiers home they will bring back wheat as a return cargo. I can not see why the price of wheat will not drop sharply as soon as that wheat begins to come into the market. At present we can sell to our allies American wheat at the prevailing prices, before the Australian and the Argentine wheat gets to Europe in large quantities. I feel that it would be a mistake on the economic side not to take advantage of selling our wheat in Europe at present prices in as large quantities as we can. In that view of the matter this is not all outlay. There are some savings.

We are now obliged to pay the farmers of America $2.26 a bushel for all the wheat they raise this year. I do not know the figures, but I am satisfied that when the wheat is turned in to the Government and we buy it next year there will not be roofs enough for us to put it under. It will have to lie out in the open and spoil. I believe it is a good financial proposition to sell this wheat to Europe now, at the prices that prevail, rather than to keep it at home, allow other wheat to go in from the Argentine and from Australia, and the Government have to make up the difference to our farmers, as they are pledged to do.

I believe this amendment is offered with a view to delay and with a view to humiliating the President of the United States. The President went to Europe, and many people were opposed to his going. I myself had some doubts about the wisdom of it; but after I saw the reception that he received in Paris, after I saw the very large influence that his personal presence gave to the United States, I had no further doubts. He is on the spot. He knows whether or not suffering people are to be fed. I have no doubt it is intolerable to him, as it is intolerable to me, to think of a surplus of wheat in this country and starving mouths in Europe and not do his utmost to bring those two together. No humane man can stand out against that. My heart is touched, as much as that of the Senator from Georgia, when I think of people starving in this country. I believe there will be propositions in this Senate to relieve starvation in this country before the spring is over; and I hope they will come up before my term ends, so that I can vote for them, because I am that sort of a radical. I do not believe it is ever excusable to allow anyone to starve in the United States of America; and I hope the time will come when no one ever will be permitted to starve anywhere in the world, friend or enemy.

Other countries are not waiting for their parliaments to vote these supplies. Other countries are not waiting for commissioners to be appointed and ratified by senates or parliaments. The organization is already perfected. Mr. Hoover and Mr. Davis are on the ground, and have been on the ground for weeks and months. They have their plans started. They are already feeding some starving people. We have all had some experience with the ratification of appointments by the President of the United States; and if this amendment should be adopted, and the President should appoint these men immediately, I have no confidence that the nominations would be acted upon within weeks, and meanwhile hundreds of people are starving while we talk about this bill. I do not know their names, I do not know just where they live, but I am satisfied of that. This proposition to have commissioners appointed by the President and ratified by the Senate is not made, I fear, in the interest of facilitating the feeding of people in Europe or even in the interest of economy.

I think I have covered all the points that I intended to cover. Now, if I may yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania, I shall be very glad to right any injustice or make any explanation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I shall claim the floor in my own right when the Senator is through.

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has adopted an attitude toward the brief remarks I made which is only excusable on account of the fact that he has not been in the Senate for nearly half a year, and therefore can not be supposed to be in any close touch with the temper of the Senate or of the American people on many of these questions. He has been going as a tourist over the battle fields and through the ancient towns of Europe, and I hope has been enjoying himself while he has been on that visit. During that time, Mr. President, I have been in Washington every day, not missing a single day, working very hard from 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning until 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, on the revenue bill and other measures, in committee and on the floor of the Senate; and it is only the Senator's ignorance, due to his absence, that justifies him in making that slighting reference to the fact that I am only here for a few moments to-day.

I do not know whether the Senator considers a legitimate investigation, free from malice and prompted only by patriotism, as partaking of the qualities of poison gas or not. I do not know whether he views with any apprehension an investigation of that colossal scandal, the squandering of six or seven hundred millions of dollars in the aeroplane transaction. I do not know whether or not he would like to cover up that transaction and have the American people forget it. Is he afraid to turn on the light? Does he brand a legitimate investigation, free from malice and prompted only by patriotism and a desire to bring the guilty to justice, as partaking of the methods of those who use poison gas? I fear, Mr. President, if that is his view, he would like to suppress investigation of the $700,000,000 scandal in the aeroplane transaction.

The Senator may have heard when he was in Europe how Pittsburgh soldiers were ordered over the top and slain in battle, never having had a rifle in their hands until the morning when they were ordered to advance upon the enemy. Does he call an investigation, when those in power are able to make it, of the reason why those brave boys never shot a rifle in their lives until they walked up to slaughter, where the Germans killed three Americans to one of their own who fell. Does he call a legitimate investigation of that gross inefficiency of the War Department partaking of the methods of poison gas? If he does, I fear that he also wants to suppress any investigation of inefficiency which resulted in the delay of the war, its continuation, and the slaughter of thousands of Americans unnecessarily. I do not know what he means by his suggestion, but I, for one, know that when the Pittsburgh soldiers return to this country they will demand to know the reason why they were ordered over the top practically without rifles, because they had never shot a rifle until ordered to the charge.

Does the Senator wish to suppress, and brand it as partaking of the nature or the methods of poison gas, the investigation of the Ford ships, which every shipbuilder in America pronounces to be failures and hardly capable of keeping afloat upon the ocean, an investigation now being conducted by the Naval Affairs Committee? Does he brand that legitimate investigation, conducted under Democratic auspices, as partaking of the methods of poison gas? Perhaps he also wants to protect Mr. Ford in the questionable transactions involved in the construction of these vessels.

Does the Senator brand the investigation of Hog Island, with its extraordinary and colossal extravagance, and the very mysterious discrepancies between estimates and expenditures, running away into the millions, as partaking of the methods of those whose use poison gas, or does he want to suppress any investigation of the malefactors, if there be any, involved in the Hog Island transaction?

I do not know what the Senator means by branding investigations universally demanded by the American people, and as inevitable as the sunrise, as partaking of such methods, unless he secretly has friends to protect.

The Senator says this amendment is aimed to humiliate the President and to delay the relief of the sufferers in Europe. Mr. President, the President can send his nominations by wireless communication to the Senate to-morrow, and I have no doubt the nominations will be confirmed on the same day. I do not understand that any Senator is particular as to the personnel of the commission; but I only have in mind, as far as I am concerned, the desire to have the money spent in an orderly way by commissioners or other officials who will be responsible to Congress and within the reach of Congress. A hundred million dollars, Mr. President, is no little sum; and if the generosity of the American people prompts them to give it for the relief of the people in Europe, my only desire is to have it spent in a legal and an orderly way, and not by men who are half foreigners and who may never return to the United States.

It is no argument to my mind that any other commissioner than Mr. Hoover would not be selected as chairman of the international commission. Let them select whatever chairman they may desire, but let America's contribution be distributed on behalf of America by Americans and according to America's constitutional and legal methods.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I see that I owe no apology whatever to the Senator from Pennsylvania. I rather owe him admiration, encomium, for his skill in the very form of attack to which I directed attention.

I have not tried to shield anybody. The Democratic administration has not tried to shield anybody. Mr. Hoover has been investigated. The airplane scandal, to which the Senator refers, has been investigated. The Hog Island Shipbuilding Co. has been investigated. Everything has been investigated; and it is one of the cruel things to one who returns from Europe, where America has been given very large credit for winning the great war, the greatest the world has ever seen, where American soldiers have proved their bravery on field after field, and have gone up against the guns not always as well supplied as I wish they had been.

There will not be any attempt to shield anyone. There has been no attempt to shield anyone. The various things that the Senator has mentioned have already been investigated, and adverse reports have been returned by Democrats in some of those cases.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. NEW. The Senator from New Hampshire says that the aircraft matter has been investigated. True. I am reminded that certain recommendations were made by Mr. Hughes, for instance, who made that examination at the request of the President. Those recommendations made by Mr. Hughes included one that a court-martial should be instituted, and should make investigations involving the conduct of certain individuals. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true not only that that court-martial never was instituted but that the persons referred to were pardoned in advance of hearings, or acquitted, at least, in advance of hearings, by the official action of the Secretary of War?

Mr. HOLLIS. I think part of what the Senator says may be true. I am not informed as to whether it is all true or not. A report was made by Mr. Hughes, a very distinguished Republican. Whether or not the Democratic administration saw fit to carry out all of those recommendations I do not know. I should not be surprised if they had seen fit not to carry out some of them. My reference was to the threat contained in the speech of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania that they wanted a man to spend this money in the United States who would be subject to a subpoena after the 4th day of March. I will say, for the benefit of those Senators who do not know it, that it looks as if the Republican Party will have control of both branches of the Congress after the 4th of March; and if they succeed in forcing an extra session they probably will go to investigating very thoroughly; and if they do, and if they achieve their object, America will lose a very large part of the credit she now has all over the world for performing a very large thing in a very large, creditable, and efficient way.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, my first reaction upon reading this bill was quite persuasive. To take from our store and feed the world's hungry, to alleviate distress and want, to succor those who were suffering, and generally to be the good Samaritan to all on earth, appealed to every instinct of charity and benevolence. But as the debate proceeded and explanations which did not explain were offered by those supporting the measure, and finally when we were told, as we were yesterday, with the same old warnings with which we became familiar during the war, that we must pass this bill because it was demanded, and dare not do otherwise because we were requested, it seemed to me that the position originally presented was somewhat modified. It seems as if now, after the war, the same old push-button methods of legislation, with the same old rubber-stamp approval by Congress, are to be invoked, just as they were invoked during the time of stress and the time of crisis in our country's history. And then, when yesterday I heard the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who presides over the Agricultural Committee, and when I heard that statement in unqualified terms tell some of the purposes of this bill as detailed in testimony before the Agricultural Committee, the sentimental aspect of the measure was changed, the tugging at my heartstrings by appeals to feed the hungry of the world ceased.

In order that I may preserve it and that I may reiterate it, I read what the Senator from Oklahoma yesterday solemnly declared upon this floor in respect to this measure. I know naught of the facts except such as then in open session were presented, but this is what he said:

> I may say that Mr. Taliaferro, who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture this morning, the vice president of the Hammond-Standish Packing House Co., of Detroit, stated that England has imported a great deal of salted meat, which was not grateful to the appetite of the English people; that they were now not willing to consume it and would not consume it; that it was the purpose to sell this salted meat to the people of southern Europe, to whom it was palatable and who use it, I think, in cooking vegetables; and that the English, by disposing of this surplus supply of salted meat on hand, would create a market in England for more palatable meat.
> He also stated that this $100,000,000, he understood, was to be used by Mr. Hoover in creating a market in Europe for packing-house products and stabilizing prices of packing-house products so as to protect the packers of this country against loss. That is the substance of what he said.

And then the Senator from Oklahoma put in the RECORD the testimony of Mr. Taliaferro, found at page 1746 of the RECORD, and to which I invite the attention of this body.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator has just referred to the assertion that Mr. Hoover is undertaking to protect the packing houses on account of the products which they have purchased and which they hope to supply to the European countries. I should like to inquire if the Senator has investigated the question as to the policy which has previously been adopted of increasing the food products of this country, and especially the meat products of this country?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator I will say I have read what was stated by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee upon the floor of the Senate yesterday. Beyond the facts that he related I have not investigated the subject, and I know nothing concerning it. I was reciting what he then related.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think this is an illustration of the evil which comes from statements that are partly true. It is well known that in order to increase the pork products of this country a price for live hogs in the general market of the country was practically fixed by agreement, and that in order to enable the farmers of the country to increase the pork product at a reasonable cost and to increase the production of pork it was necessary to do that very thing. So the price of live pork was fixed at 17½ cents a pound, and that price yet prevails.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator for anything in the nature of a question, but I do not desire to yield for the presentation of an argument or a speech by the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I shall propound my question. If that be true, is it not wisdom for Mr. Hoover to undertake to maintain that price and to sell those products at that price and thus prevent any loss to the United States Treasury?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator propounds to me a query as to whether or not it is a good thing to vote $100,000,000 under the pretense of relieving starving people for the purpose of increasing prices for packers, I answer him unqualifiedly no. If he challenges the facts related by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, I must leave him and that chairman to determine just exactly what the truth of the situation may be. Yesterday it was stated upon this floor, and the remarks of the chairman of the Agricultural Committee were not challenged at all, and my remarks to-day related to exactly what he said then and nothing more.

Mr. President, during the war I voted for many things upon the theory that those in command said that they were necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. I was very glad to do that in every instance where the Commander in Chief thus conveyed his views to us, and I have no apology to make for having pursued that course during the prosecution of the war.

But, Mr. President, the war is ended, as the President has told us on three different occasions. No longer is it necessary upon the mere statement that something is desired to pass legislation without the usual safeguards and without the usual information; and, so far as I am concerned, I shall not, upon the mere ipse dixit of any official, no matter who he is, hereafter vote for legislation without a full disclosure of its purposes and of all the facts upon which it rests and a full knowledge of every detail concerning it.

Mr. President, in Europe to-day we are creating a multitude of small nations, the very names of which not five Members upon this floor had ever heard before we entered the war. To-day we are building Esthonia and Ukrainia and Lavonia and Lithuania and creating a new Poland and Finland, a Jugo-Slavia, and a Czecho-Slavia, a Syria, an Albania, a Montenegro, an Armenia, and various other nations, the props of all of which we are told are to be in the future American bayonets.

While building castles in the air in Europe, Mr. President, let us make firm the foundation of our house at home.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. In the very interesting list the Senator from California gave, I regret very much that he made an omission, and in order that no feelings shall be hurt in international relations, I would suggest that he include the Sultan of Hejaz.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. By accident I omitted that particularly interesting race, and doubtless others have escaped me.

Mr. PENROSE. That potentate ought not to be overlooked, because it might lead to an interruption in the amity of nations and the concert of humanity.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Quite so. It will be necessary for us to maintain that nation—I dare not pronounce it—with American bayonets, too.

I suggest that while we are building these castles in the air in Europe we make our foundation at home firm. Must our whole thought, our whole energy—indeed, our great resources—from now be devoted to Europe and perhaps Asia?

I insist, Mr. President, that it is time for an American policy. It is time for an American policy, for American business, for America's social life, for America's economic life. It is time for an American policy for American boys and American soldiers.

On Saturday evening last I listened to the perfervid orations here in behalf of this bill, all of which made appeals to our sympathy, appeals to our charity, and appeals to our benevolence. While I was listening to the eloquent gentleman then speaking in behalf of this bill, I had before me a copy of the Washington Times of that evening which described 300 American soldiers in Boston, Mass., just discharged, marching down the streets of Boston to the office of the mayor of that city and begging for employment there. I recalled the press dispatch of that week from the city of Seattle where the miserable I. W. W.'s were engaged in a demonstration which was dispersed by the police, and where after the dispersing of that demonstration it was found that among the outcast I. W. W.'s were soldiers and sailors of the United States who were being fed by the I. W. W.'s, and who were without resources or money or food. I recalled that only a brief period ago Frank Morrison, of the American Federation of Labor, said that by May next we would have in this country bread lines.

As I recalled all these things during the debate upon this bill, and as I remembered that we were asked to pay $100,000,000 to those abroad who might require food, I thought of America at this time and of the cloud on the horizon which is perhaps no bigger than a hand to-day, the cloud of unemployment which may in the next few months swiftly engulf this country and present an issue such as never before has been brought to our door.

So it is, Mr. President, that I ask for an American policy. Before we start on this tremendous enterprise of feeding indefinitely, in a manner not described, upon facts which we do not know, all the peoples of Europe I would ask something that would provide for the men who made the fight abroad, the men who come home to be demobilized, and who in this country to-day after the struggle and after bearing the burden and making the sacrifice find themselves without employment.

Remember, Mr. President, we took the jobs of these men by force. We took them when they did not wish to go, by the inexorable draft law and by the strong arm of the Government. We took them forcibly from their very jobs, and now we leave them jobless after they have borne our burden and bravely done their part.

The peculiar psychology of war is still with it. We yet see red. Our intellects are absorbed and overwhelmed with battle fields and the countries wherein the strife has been fought or where it has been most intimately felt. We are apparently blind to passing events, to crying necessities in our midst. We have been afflicted so long with a mental farsightedness that we are unable to discern what is immediately before us. But unless we readjust our vision, unless we clearly perceive and hasten to remedy what appears with portent in our country, our people will pay the price of our remissness. To-day it may appear as but a small threatening cloud of unemployment, but with each passing day it is ever increasing, and were we wise we would prevent the breaking of the storm.

On January 10 we were told in the testimony before the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate, by William E. Leiserson, chief of the Labor Department's administration bureau, and other witnesses, that unemployment in American industrial centers had steadily increased during the last four or five weeks because of the actual cessation of industry. "All industries are apparently holding off to await the trend of prices." L. K. Frank, of the Labor Department, stated: "Employers think labor prices should be reduced, but are afraid on account of unrest and strikes to cut wages. On the other hand, buyers are holding off purchasing, expecting price reduction. The effect is cumulative."

The Iron Age in a recent number puts it: "Consumer and producer are each settling down to a contest to tire out each other." In the steel and the iron trade, in the woolen and cotton mills, among the shoe manufacturers, as well as the copper industries, activity is slackening. When orders on the books are completed industry will slow down even more rapidly. Manufacturers and other users of raw materials will not purchase at present prices, fearing ruin if prices go lower.

Only a fraction of our armies have been demobilized. I listened yesterday to the astounding figures given by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] of the number of unemployed at present. With business shackled, with a taxation positively crippling it, with its timidity and fear of the future, we may well shudder at the possibilities of unemployment in the near future.

Can we not see these things, or has war set us upon the clouds, where with iridescent dreams we are dazzled with the brilliancy of the distant rainbow? The solution may be difficult, but we can at least make the immediate endeavor. And our first duty, our first appropriation, our sustained and united effort, should be devoted not to increasing by $100,000,000 the burdens of our business but by devoting every ounce and every dollar to relieving our own.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I call to the attention of the Senator from California that what he is now suggesting was attempted as long ago as last September, not as early as it should have been done, but a definite proposition was then introduced and submitted to the Senate and is now resting in the Committee on the Judiciary to provide work for the demobilized soldiers and the demobilized war workers.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If there is a proposition which in its essence presents a solution of this difficult problem it should be on the floor of the Senate to-day, and the appropriation that is necessary to carry it into effect should be passed before we undertake to feed all the peoples of the world, or before we undertake to tax our own people in any definite fashion for a purpose that is not wholly disclosed, and concerning which the facts are lacking. Our business is entitled to nothing less than that, and duty and obligation demand from us that these men who across the sea have performed their task and done their duty shall be taken care of.

Mr. President, I repeat I want first an American policy for American boys and for the land in which we live, and when that policy shall have been adopted and shall have been passed and put in operation, I will join you in any appropriation that you want for anything in Esthonia and Lavonia. I will join you in any relief measures that you may desire for Lithuania and Finland. I will join you, then, in any act that you may think necesary for the future of the world or for aiding Poland or for aiding Ukraine or any other nation we expect to erect in the present peace conference.

But, Mr. President, the soldier who has looked into the muzzle of a machine gun must not be compelled to look into an empty dinner pail.

Mr. POINDEXTER obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator yield to me long enough to answer the query put to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will conclude in a very short time, and give the Senator then an opportunity to answer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a great many of the essential facts with which we are to deal in voting upon this bill have been illuminated by the debate which has just taken place. The uncertainty of the information as to the conditions in Europe upon which we are asked to vote out of the Treasury of the United States $100,000,000 I thought was illustrated by the remark of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who returned recently from Europe, occupying a position which is claimed by the advocates of this bill to be one of authority on account of the opportunities of observation which he has had, who tells us that he does not know where the people live who need food in Europe, but that he is satisfied there are such people somewhere. That is the extent of the information which we have from the Senator from New Hampshire, just from the countries which are supposed to be relieved by this bill.

Various purposes and grounds upon which this appropriation is asked have been stated. The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has just called attention, as I am glad he did, to the significance of the statement made on the floor of the Senate yesterday afternoon by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] as to the responsible testimony which was given before the Committee on Agriculture that the purpose of this appropriation is to stabilize the meat market. To corroborate the assertion of the witness before the Committee on Agriculture I wish to call another witness, a witness whose name has frequently been used in this debate, Mr. Hoover, as to the purposes which he has in view in asking and urging Congress to put into his hands to be expended in his discretion $100,000,000 of the public funds, not to be voluntarily contributed by the people, but to be appropriated by the Congress out of taxes to be collected from the people.

In a telegram which was inserted in the RECORD by the eminent Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] who has charge of this bill, and under whose chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations it was favorably reported to the Senate, Mr. Hoover says as follows, as the telegram appears on page 1657 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 18, 1919:

> I need not repeat that strong liberal relief is to-day the only hope of stemming the tide of Bolshevism without the expenditure of lives and vast sums for military action. While it is urgently necessary to dispose of our surplus foods in order to relieve congestion and protect the producers from disaster and the consequent chaotic results—

That is the purpose, as stated by Mr. Hoover. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] added corroborative testimony a few moments ago when he said that it was a wise policy which would be subserved by the passage of this bill to expend this money buying American wheat and maintaining the wheat market before the wheat of Australia was put upon the market to lower the price.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] corroborated that view of the purpose of this appropriation in his statement upon the floor of the Senate a few moments ago—that it was a good policy for this country to use this money along the lines referred to by the witness cited by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to maintain the market in hogs.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire for a question.

Mr. HOLLIS. Did not the distinguished Senator understand me to say not that I believed the price of wheat should be maintained but that we should sell as much of it in Europe as we can while the present high prices continue? I wish to say I do not believe in maintaining the price of wheat. I do not think it should be done. It should come down as soon as possible, and the Government should stand the loss, which would come out of the taxpayers and not out of the consumers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator advocated the passage of this bill appropriating $100,000,000 in order to buy wheat, and stated it was a good policy to do that in order that the Government might be enabled to live up to the pledge which it had given of $2.26 a bushel. So he is advocating the appropriation out of the Public Treasury of the people's money in order to keep the people from losing money on the price of wheat. It is a good deal like the remedy for the shortage of fuel last winter when, in order to solve the problem of the shortage of fuel, the Government made an order that we should not use any fuel so far as the manufacturers were concerned.

Mr. HOLLIS. The argument was that we are not spending all the money. The proposition is that our associates over there will spend two or three times as much as we do, and therefore in that proportion it will be cheaper for us to sell as much wheat in Europe at present prices as long as we do not pay for it all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So says the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. He proposes, in order that we shall not lose anything in the United States on hogs, that we shall appropriate $100,000,000 out of the Public Treasury to buy hogs.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator misconstrued the purpose of my colloquy with the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. The Senator would undoubtedly have left the impression that this money was to be used for the purpose of aiding the packers of the country. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that the prices which the packers have been receiving and are yet to receive have been fixed by previous conditions, and for the purpose of increasing the food products of the country, and it was not simply to maintain something which should follow in the future, but to meet a condition which is already existing by reason of previous action.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can not yield for the Senator to discuss the question at length. I am very glad to have him correct any misapprehension which I may have had, but I think his present statement is substantially the same as the one which he made before and which I quoted. He referred to present conditions of the meat market as affected by the price which the farmers had been encouraged to hope they would get for hogs, and urged in favor of this appropriation that it would tend toward maintaining at the prices which had heretofore been fixed the market price of hogs.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on yesterday argued very elaborately in support of this measure with his usual dramatic force, and one would have been deeply impressed with the weight of the conclusions which had been arrived at by such a distinguished Senator upon a matter of such great importance, if it were not for the rather strange circumstance that the distinguished Senator from Illinois has heretofore publicly announced in effect—I will quote his own words in a moment—that he is not guided in the recommendations which he makes upon the floor of the Senate nor the vote which he casts as a representative of the imperial State of Illinois by his conscience and his judgment, by the determination of whether a measure is wise or foolish, or whether it is right or wrong, but he is guided in these matters as a Senator of the United States by what the President wishes.

The Senator from Illinois took an oath at that desk to support the Constitution of the United States, and yet on October 17——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Has my colleague overlooked the fact that the Senator from Illinois stated sometime ago that the Constitution was obsolete?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I had overlooked that fact. I suppose the Constitution is obsolete in face of the fealty of the Senator from Illinois and his unfaltering attachment to the wishes of another man as determining his action in the high position which he occupies.

On the 17th of October last the Senator from Illinois not only declared that view as a rule of action but he introduced a resolution in the Senate in which he proposed that the Senate itself should be governed not by its conscience and its judgment and the Constitution of the United States, not by a determination to support some known and expressed views or principles or policy of the President, but that it should announce and resolve that it should be guided in the future by whatever course the President might request it to take. The language of the resolution is "whatever methods he may employ" the Senate indorses and approves; "and indorses such determination as he shall reach as to the manner best calculated to preserve the dignity of the Nation."

It is inevitable, in the face of that rule of action which the Senator from Illinois has announced, that the influence of his conclusions as announced upon the floor of the Senate should be somewhat weakened as compared with what they would be if they expressed his own personal judgment.

Various grounds have been given for this proposed legislation. The President says, in one of the telegrams which have been introduced into the RECORD, that it is to stop the march of Bolshevism; to quote his exact words, he says:

Bolshevism can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food.

It has been asserted by some that the request for this enormous appropriation was not for charity, that it was not based upon an act of humanitarianism. In that they differ from the President as to the purposes and grounds upon which he asks that the appropriation be made, for, in addition to using food instead of force to check the march of Bolshevism, with its savagery and destruction, the President states that he wants primarily, first of all, to put it as a great humanitarian act.

I therefore request—

The President states in the telegram introduced by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]—

I therefore request that you should ask Congress to make available to me an immediate appropriation of $100,000,000 for the broad purpose of providing foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe outside of Germany as may be determined upon by me from time to time as necessary. I wish to appeal to the great sense of charity—

Not for the conduct of the war, not under the war powers of Congress, but as a great act of charity—and good will of the American people toward the suffering and to place this act upon a primarily humanitarian basis of the first magnitude.

There is the ground and purpose as stated by the President, who is the official initiating this movement to appropriate this money.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] further illustrated that purpose in his statement a moment ago upon the floor that if he knew that there were starving people in Europe and there were surplus stores of wheat in the United States it would appeal to the impulses of his heart to relieve their need. That is a very noble impulse; that is an impulse which I am sure would be shared by every Member of this body and by practically the entire American people, that they should feel that those who are suffering for the primary necessities of life should find relief. The President's idealism, his appeal that this appropriation should be put primarily upon the great basis of a humanitarian act is creditable to him, but let me call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire and of the Senate to this, which seems to me ought to be one of the fundamental considerations in an act of charity, of the giving of money, that one should be careful to gratify his charitable impulses from his own funds and not from somebody else's pocket. I do not think that the Senator from New Hampshire nor myself, nor even the President of the United States, ought to be given authority to gratify our feelings of pity out of funds to which we paid but a small, if any, contribution, but which were raised by levying burdens upon the masses of the people.

If a man occupies a position of trust, he is prohibited under the law and in all good policy from dealing as trustee with himself in his individual right. The reason of that is that, of course, he would not have the same interest in the preservation of property and of money belonging to somebody else that he would have in the preservation of his own; that however honest he might deem himself to be, his discretion and judgment as trustee would be overcome by his personal interest. So it is that the powers of government are limited to those which are provided in the Constitution and the laws, and there is no right nor jurisdiction in the President nor in the Senate to go outside of the Constitution in order to do charity throughout the world, for they are dealing with funds which do not belong to those officials, but which belong to the people. You have got no right to take them out of the Treasury for the purposes stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, by the Senator from New Mexico, by the President, or by Mr. Hoover, either to stabilize the wheat market or to do an act of charity to some unknown people, as to whom the Senator from New Hampshire says he does not know where they live.

Mr. President, this is not the first occasion when I have seen officials in high places attempting to gratify their principles of generosity at the expense of somebody else. The Government is a trustee. In our capacity here as Senators we are acting as trustees of the public funds. A few years ago the President came before Congress and asked us to do a great act of generosity. How? Not by contributing anything from his or from our estates, but by surrendering to the other nations of the world the special privileges which the American people owned in a great public work they had constructed at their own expense and for their own benefit—the Panama Canal. He urged us then, regardless of obligations but in a spirit of generosity, to be liberal in the grant of the public favor.

We did not have any right to do that. We had no right to dispose of a material interest of the American people in order to be generous to the foreign nations of the world. The Panama Canal belonged to the American people, and while the President succeeded under the spirit of subserviency similar to that which was expressed in the resolution which I read of the Senator from Illinois, in having the act repealed that had been placed upon the statute books exempting American vessels from paying tolls in the Panama Canal, I want to say that it is still an issue, and that the American people yet will reclaim the right to the use of the Panama Canal to the fullest extent of which it is capable of being used for the special benefit of the American people, who constructed it and who own it.

It is not very long, Mr. President, since the proposition was made to Congress that we should reach into the Public Treasury, take out $25,000,000, and pay it to the Republic of Colombia, in order to secure the friendship of that country. The argument was then made upon the floor of the Senate that if we did not do it they would not be our friends. It was an effort to buy the good will of a people.

At about the same time we had a measure here to surrender the Philippine Islands, because some other nation might make trouble with us about the Philippine Islands if we did not surrender them. It is a very easy way, of course, to dispose of trouble, to yield to all demands and to surrender territories which have been attached to us through a generation of close and intimate relationship, but if we should continue that way of settling our troubles, by giving up one interest to this nation and another interest to that nation, appropriating $25,000,000 here and $100,000,000 there, in order that we might in that way avoid trouble, ultimately we would get to a point where the United States would have nothing left, and there would be no interest or property about which any trouble could arise.

We are much more apt to avoid trouble, much more apt to maintain the respect and good will of the people of the world if we maintain our own self-respect. The greatest act of humanitarianism that the American Government can do for the people of the world is to maintain the power, the sovereignty, the prosperity, and the opportunity of the American Republic.

I am opposed, Mr. President, to this $100,000.000 appropriation to relieve indiscriminate, unknown, and undesignated populations of Europe. It is simply another step in the policy of involvement and entanglement in the racial difficulties and petty disputes with which Europe for a thousand years has been wrecked, and with which the leading nations of Europe are better fitted to deal than we, far remote as our country is from the scene of those troubles.

We have great allies in Europe; they are our allies, or ought to be, however much the President may insist upon calling them merely "associates." They are allies in fact; they are allies in the affections of their several peoples; they are allies by common sacrifices for a common purpose in maintaining the liberty of the world. England and France are intelligent, their Governments are as well informed of conditions in Europe as we are, and instead of the United States undertaking to cross the Atlantic Ocean and to assume control, the hegemony and the leadership, in European and Asiatic affairs the proper policy of this Government should be to say to those great, intelligent, benign, civilized allies, "We will follow your leadership in European affairs"; and then they will follow ours in American affairs.

Mr. President, in all the debate that has taken place upon this bill there has not been presented here any request from France or Great Britain that we should contribute to this fund. If they want it they would ask for it. I have information from our soldiers who have entered Germany and are now occupying castles and fortresses on the Rhine, that they have found conditions in Germany far superior to those in France and Belgium. Yet, Mr. President, I wish to assert upon my own responsibility that one of the purposes for which this $100,000,000 is asked is the relief not of Russia nor of Poland but of Germany.

I say nothing in criticism of Mr. Hoover, because it really has no bearing upon the decision of this question; it is simply dragging in an irrelevant matter, which would necessarily complicate the issue. I am not saying whether he was right or whether he was wrong, but the Senate is entitled to know the facts before it acts upon a matter which is great in the amount of money involved and still greater in the policies to which it will commit the United States, and the increased obligations which will be fastened upon us in the administration of the expenditure of this money. When Mr. Hoover, under whom the money is to be spent, left the United States, the one obsession that he had was to get food into Germany. The President in effect announced that policy publicly not long ago, when his statement appeared in the newspapers that Germany would not get food unless she maintained order. That is equivalent to saying that upon certain conditions we would feed Germany.

This bill has been amended and guarded ostensibly to prevent any of the food to be purchased with this $100,000,000 from going into Germany; but those provisions, Mr. President, amount to no more than the ink upon the paper so far as preventing the sending of this food to Germany is concerned, if the President and Mr. Hoover intend to carry out the determination which they both had when they sailed for Europe.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I gather the impression that it is the Senator's understanding that this $100,000,000 will be used for the purchase of food to be given to the people of Europe. If the Senator will allow me, I have a different understanding than that. I will say to the Senator that we had a witness before our committee this morning who stated that he was a member of the commission that went to Europe, that he was in all the conferences with Mr. Hoover and Mr. Hurley and with the allies, and that it was Mr. Hoover's idea that this money should be used in purchasing food to be sold for cash. But the Senator is correct in assuming that it would be sold not only to the allied but also to the enemy countries. The witness was asked specifically as to what the understanding was as to Mr. Hoover, Mr. Hurley, and the allies, and he stated very plainly—and I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] will bear me out in this statement—that it was thought the best way to stop anarchy and Bolshevism, even in the enemy countries—and Germany was mentioned—was to permit food to go into those countries.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much obliged to the Senator for that suggestion. It was stated by persons in authority in connection with this matter some time ago, when it was first suggested that it might be necessary. It seemed at that time to be a far-fetched proposition, as to hope of accomplishment, to ask Congress to appropriate money to feed Germany, in view of the records of the last four years. It was stated at that time that if these parties were enabled to get food into contiguous countries, such as Holland, Sweden, and Switzerland, then the getting of it into Germany would take care of itself. That is one way by which the limitations placed upon this bill can easily be, and undoubtedly will be, avoided. Another way by which these limitations can be, and undoubtedly will be, rendered entirely nugatory is to comply literally with the prohibition against shipping any food purchased with this money into Germany; but, of course, the food purchased with this money will take the place of an equal amount of food already in Europe, which can be shipped into Germany and this food put in its place. That is a well-known expedient which was used by neutral countries during the early part of the war, who were supplying Germany with a great amount of foodstuffs while literally complying with the terms of the British blockade.

Mr. President, knowing those circumstances, knowing the President's determination—and those who know the President know that the word "determination" is a good word to use, because when he has arrived at a conclusion he is set in his opinion—knowing that he proposed—and I have no reason to believe that he has changed his mind—notwithstanding the objection of some, to see that Germany is fed, I am opposed to that, and consequently I am opposed to this bill.

I recollect that when Germany occupied Belgium and was under the obligation of every belligerent which occupies a conquered country in war to feed the conquered people, Germany not only did not feed Belgium, but when the generous people of the United States, coming to their relief, not out of the Public Treasury, but out of donations to the Belgian relief fund and through the Red Cross, sent food to that population which Germany evidently was endeavoring to exterminate, Germany even went to the extent of sinking the relief ships to prevent the population of Belgium from being relieved, and submitted them to the torture of slow starvation, of deportation of their men and women into Germany, where, though starving, they were overworked, so that the most of them never returned to their native country, Germany evidently having the purpose, perhaps never before conceived by the government of a supposedly civilized nation, to exterminate a whole people. That we now, without any more knowledge than we have as to the exigencies of the German population, should appropriate money, which we have no constitutional authority to appropriate, and which, according to all the evidence we have, is going into Germany, it seems to me ought not to receive the support of any considerable number of Senators.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the United States living up to its obligations in this war to the last letter. We should see that this war is properly finished; we should maintain in Europe some troops—I do not think it will require many—until the peace terms are agreed upon and the readjustment is effected. That consummation should be accomplished as early as possible, and, when it is accomplished, we should withdraw our troops from Europe and leave Europe to itself. The policy of this Government should be to extricate itself as rapidly as possible from the problems with which it has to deal growing out of this war. Our soldiers have performed their function. They have played their part in winning the war. They want to come home, and they ought to be allowed to come home just as fast as they can be transported.

To say, Mr. President, that we should set up a certain boundary line between Italy and Jugo-Slavonia or a certain boundary for Poland, giving Poland access to the sea—with all of which I sympathize and for which I am willing to vote so far as the making of terms of peace is concerned—but to say that, after that has been accomplished and the various nationalities of the Balkans have been redistributed under governments which are to grow out of the peace conference, the United States is going to guarantee those conditions to remain there permanently, and is to be called upon from year to year to send troops to Europe to see that the conditions that are established by the peace conference are maintained, is a false policy and one which would menace the perpetuity of our institutions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Has anything authoritative come from our representatives at the peace conference indicative of a purpose upon their part so to pledge the future of the United States—that is, commit it to a policy that would compel this Nation to guarantee the territorial integrity of nations that may be set up as the result of the breaking up of central Europe?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not seen any declaration on that subject from Col. House, who seems to be the chief mentor in such matters; and, as a matter of fact, I have not seen any declaration as to the views of any member of our peace delegation, except the President of the United States; and the President of the United States in times past, whatever interpretation may be given to his most recent utterances on the subject of a league of nations, has declared in favor of a league of nations with jurisdiction and with physical power to enforce peace all over the world—in Europe, in Asia, and in Africa.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think the language uttered by the President is susceptible of the broad construction which has just been placed upon it by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The President, I know, used the word "power." He said it should be a league with power to enforce its decrees.

Mr. KING. But I was about to inquire of the Senator if it is not his desire, and the desire of the American people generally, as well as the Christian people generally throughout the world, that so far as possible some agreement or some understanding may be reached that will minimize the chances of war in the future and provide some arbitral tribunal by which at least justiciable controversies may be settled?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, yes; I think so; but that is an utterly different proposition from a league of nations to enforce peace as proposed by Mr. Taft and his society. I hope at some future time, if it should be pertinent, to discuss at greater length that question and the great organizations which are promoting leagues of so-called independent nations. I noticed the other day a full-page advertisement in a paper in this city, signed by a very curious variety of people, ranging all the way from great New York international bankers to Chicago settlement workers, excellent ladies like Miss Jane Addams and Miss Julia Lathrop, who have been largely engaged in and devoted to the useful work of looking after poor children, now engaged in framing and publishing authoritatively a constitution of government for the world. They, along with Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, Mr. Norman Hapgood, and others, not only say that this government of the world should have an army and a navy, but that it should have a legislature, and that in its fundamentals it should occupy toward the nations of the world the situation which the Federal Union occupies toward the States of the United States. The Senator need not deceive himself. Back of this phrase, "the league of nations to enforce peace," there is, in the minds of its advocates, the surrender of the sovereignty of this country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in our own country for many years, and particularly since the days of William Ladd in 1842, there have been many very eminent men and women who have earnestly advocated the plan of a league of nations. I have no doubt that ex-President Taft and a large number of people in this country to-day are very anxious to have a league of nations organized. In this class are men like Prof. Minor, who has recently written a very interesting book upon this subject. He seems to be in favor of a supernation, a nation with a constitution which is formed as a result of the delegation of sovereign power by other nations.

What I was about to say, however, was this: I do not think the Senator is warranted in stating that President Wilson or any of the peace representatives of this country are committed to any plan or have advocated any plan calling for the abdication or the surrender by this Government of any of the rights of sovereignty. I do not believe that the American people would be willing to have this Nation surrender these sovereign powers which are essential to constitute it a nation, among them being the power to declare war and to make peace, and submit to a league of nations the question of determining what the Monroe doctrine is and how it shall be enforced or questions affecting its honor and affecting territorial integrity. But that President Wilson and other men and women in this country who are thinking along the lines of progress and civilization desire, if possible, the formulation of some plan that will minimize the possibilities of war in the future we must concede; and to that extent we must applaud them, and applaud any sincere effort——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can not yield to the Senator for an extended address.

Mr. KING. I am through with what I rose to interrogate the Senator about. I only wish to say that we must applaud them for those efforts and wish them Godspeed in their attempts to establish peace and prevent the recurrence of wars.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not applaud the President in his efforts to form a supergovernment of the world, which he undoubtedly has proposed. I agree with the Senator from Utah that he has announced no detailed plan, and that is one of the remarkable features of his attitude. He draws outlines only. I notice that when he reached Paris it was reported, and very plausibly stated—whether it was true or not, it might have been true—that Mr. Georges Clemenceau, the French premier, asked him for his plan, what kind of a league of nations this was—I am just paraphrasing the language—that he had been advocating so long, and the President said he did not have any; and you can imagine the surprise of the French premier at the President's answer, and yet that undoubtedly is true. It is characteristic of the President not to have plans but to indulge in generalities.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just before the interruption by the Senator from Utah, the Senator from Washington was discussing what I consider a very vital question in connection with this agreement, and I am impelled to ask this question from the conclusions that he seemed to draw from his discussion. It is this:

The Senator says that he would approve of a treaty that should provide for the construction of new nations of the Jugo-Slavs and the Czecho-Slovaks and the Poles, this barrier around Germany, but that he does not approve of any policy on the part of this Government of sending its soldiers there to sustain those governments after they have been created. Without some one sustaining them, I should like to ask the Senator how long he believes that Poland would last against the aggressions of a new Germany or a reborn Russia? How will you defend them after you have placed them on their feet unless you do it with the armies of the nations that put them on their feet? And how can we avoid our share of sustaining them, for at least a reasonable length of time, together with our allies?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the question of the Senator from North Dakota presents very succinctly the problem of our future relations with Europe. I infer from the Senator's question that his opinion is that when we have established an independent Poland—which I think ought to be established in this peace conference, because it could not stand alone against the aggressions, perhaps, of either Russia or Germany, those who have partitioned it and committed this governmental and international crime of the ages, the partitioning of a nation as you would carve a turkey upon the table, because it could not stand alone against those same powers that had rended it in three parts in the years gone by—he would have the United States send its Army and its Navy to Europe to maintain the independence of Poland.

If he asks me if I am in favor of that, I say no; I am not in favor of it, and I say no, whether independent Poland, however desirable it may be, and however the American people may love liberty, lasts but one year or for a hundred years. The United States can do more for Poland and for the world by preserving our liberties, our peculiar ideals and traditions upon this continent, affording a refuge in the future as we have in the past for the Poles and for others, with such restrictions as the times may call for upon immigration, than we can by involving ourselves in perpetual war in the name of peace. That is what it would be.

Man, whether in a league of nations or whether under the principles of nationality, is in a natural state of war. We are warring here in our several communities constantly. We go out with force every day and arrest some man who is making war on his neighbor and punish him for it. The very terms which the advocates of this league of nations use imply going to war when necessary. The distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who sits by me, is one of the most convincing advocates of such a league; and it has surprised me, knowing the traditions under which he has been bred and his devotion to the principles of national self-government, and the independence and liberty of this country, and his descent from revolutionary stock. For when he proposes that there shall be a league of nations with military power to enforce peace, the enforcement of peace with military power is war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator thinks, then, that these children, these new nations created by our allies and ourselves through a formal declaration that was made more than a year ago, and approved by this country, should, the moment they are placed upon their feet, be left as you would leave a child at the den of a tiger, to be devoured——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Without protection, without a determination to make good our declaration that these nations should exist?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. How can we possibly escape our duty to perform our part in maintaining the territorial and sovereign integrity of those nations at least until such time as they can stand upon their own feet?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think I can answer the Senator's question. I would not leave such a nation to be a prey to these enemies on all sides. What I said was that I would not favor the United States sending its Army and its Navy there to maintain its independence. But we are dealing not with the Continent of Europe but with the world. The policy for the United States should be to say to our great allies in Europe: "As to Europe, we follow your leadership. We will give you our moral support, as we have given you our material support in this great war. We have done some part, at least, in the great achievement of preserving liberty; but we will leave to you—to England, to France, to Italy—the duty of policing Europe. We will perform the duty, under the Monroe doctrine, of preserving peace in the New World."

Why should the United States, one of the youngest of the nations, undertake to assume the leadership in preserving peace and establishing the conditions of the Old World as well as of the New World? Do you not think we will have done our part if we take care of this great hemisphere and see that there are maintained here law, order, liberty, and opportunity? Is not that enough? What more can you expect us to do?

Mr. President, I have a strong suspicion, which amounts to a belief, that the great powers of Europe allied with us in the maintenance of civilization, our allies in this war, not only are not anxious for us to attempt to share in the affairs of Europe, certainly not that we should undertake to dominate those affairs, but that they resent it. I think, if I may be bold enough to say so, that America has not exhibited a high order of diplomacy in Paris. I think we have offended the refined sensibilities of those highly intelligent and polished people. We have offended them by making appeals to political parties in their country, as we would be offended if Lloyd George or Clemenceau should come to the United States and take up with our Government the question of restoring order and security in Mexico, and if, because the Government of the United States did not agree with them as to the policies which they proposed, they should go out over the country and take it up over the heads of the Government with the American people. If they did that, we would resent it. They resent what we have done; and it has created underneath the surface a breach between those allies whose greatest purpose should be to draw closer together in friendship and amity and for the salvation of the world.

Talk about a league of nations! We have to-day, or could have if we would cultivate it, such a league of nations that has accomplished the greatest enforcement of peace that the President has ever dreamed of. They enforced peace against the armed hordes of Germany. They enforced peace against the greatest military power that was ever organized since the sun began to make its circles in the universe. We ought to cherish not a league but an entente; not a supergovernment but a friendly comity of nations based—as a distinguished British author said in this city in a speech which I had the privilege of hearing a few weeks ago—upon nothing more than common sense and good will.

Can we not act with common sense in our dealings with our allies, to abandon a little of the abstract and adopt a little more of the concrete, to get down from the general and place our feet upon the specific? Can we not cultivate in our dealings with our allies good will—nay, more, affection? I do not think there is a tie between man and woman that is stronger or sweeter than the love that the soldier feels for his comrades at the front, fighting a common enemy, sharing in the hardships of the trenches, in the dangers of the battle. That is the affection which has existed, and which, if we exercise common sense and good will, will continue to exist between the great Anglo-Saxon confederation and their friend who upheld civilization for a thousand years with the beacon light of leadership—the great French nation—and also Italy, the mother of modern culture. What more league of nations do you want than that? When we have at our feet priceless jewels that have proven their worth why should we go wandering off across the world looking for a pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, chasing dreams? Why should we seek other league of nations when we have the best and bravest league of nations that the world has ever seen and which we are likely to cast away in seeking for something unreal?

Mr. President, I did not expect to speak on these subjects in saying what I had to say in opposition to this bill, misnamed an appropriation bill. It ought to be called a misappropriation bill—a bill for the misappropriation of $100,000,000. So long as I have been diverted to this subject I may say a word with reference to the duty and the wisdom of cherishing as something precious the good will of France, Italy, Great Britain, and the United States for each other and of avoiding an estrangement between them. The blessings to mankind that came from the vision of Patrick Henry, the first great leader in the movement for independence, from the achievements of Washington and his mighty colaborers in the cause of liberty, the free institutions and equal opportunities of America, impose a special responsibility upon those to whom in this generation they have been committed.

Even before our peace delegation arrived in France there were sent out statements that "if England did not do so and so," with a tone of swagger and threat, "we would do so and so." The English papers printed and commented upon it with such restraint as their politeness impelled them to exercise. It was stated that if England would not agree to the "freedom of the seas" we would build a Navy bigger than England's—a swashbuckling proposition at the same time that we were advocating disarmament. The inconsistency of this attitude is immaterial to the purpose for which I mention it. Disarmament and a Navy greater than England's! I will pass that by. But what I regret, and what the American people ought to feel sorry for, is the effort to create a military rivalry, or at least that which tends to create bad feeling, between ourselves and our great ally, whose navy and army have saved us from the aggressions and the despotism of Germany.

In the testimony before the Naval Affairs Committee of the House this same sort of diplomacy was manifested, where it was plainly intimated by authoritative witnesses that this proposition for a paper Navy was to aid the President in meeting the objections of England to his policy of so-called "freedom of the seas." I say "paper" Navy, because it is beyond our means of construction in the time mentioned for the program. It could only be interpreted as a threat and not as a practical proposition, especially as we are even behind in actual construction of the authorizations already made. Instead of seeking ideal and universal leagues, it would be better diplomacy to cultivate the existing league of friendship and affection with France and Great Britain.

We do not know just what is going on in Europe, Mr. President. My own opinion is, and I think, at heart, it is shared by the leaders of the party in power in the Senate, if they would assert their personal convictions, that we should proceed as rapidly as we can not only to demobilize the Army but to demobilize the civil structure which we have built up for war purposes. The Committee on Public Information and its army of censors should be demobilized as quickly as possible. The Shipping Board, as to many of its activities, should be reduced to a peace basis at once.

The other day, when the French Government asked permits for contracts for 2,000,000 tons of ships in American shipyards, the Shipping Board refused to allow American shipyards to take that business, thus turning away one of the most desirable industries in the world—one of the most beneficial employments at a time when we needed work for idle men. Mr. Hurley, on his mission to France, declared that shipyards in America would not be allowed to accept contracts for France, when the true policy of this Government should be to welcome employment for our men and opportunity to reestablish on a permanent basis the great shipbuilding industry, in which we once excelled, as an essential accessory of a mercantile marine and of the great Navy which our far-flung interests, east and west, will require.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. If the statement made by the Senator from Washington is correct, and, of course, he believes it to be correct, and I do not challenge it, because I saw something of a similar nature in the papers——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me, I have in my desk an official report of the Shipping Board containing it.

Mr. REED. If that is the case, and it must be the case after the statement of the Senator, it seems to me that much of the complaint of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] about the unemployment of men might be met by taking the leading strings off of business so far as they have been applied. I can not see why we should have men seeking employment and at the same time have men refusing to allow the shipyards of America to build ships. It seems to me the Senator has mentioned a point which is worthy of very great consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is entirely incidental, but here is the report contained in Senate Document No. 334, of this Congress, this session, dated January 9, 1919:

War-time restrictions upon construction of wooden ships in American yards for foreign account were removed by the Shipping Board on December 6, 1918.

I will say, incidentally, that before that restriction was removed—note that the date on which it was removed was December 6—thirty-five million dollars' worth of business in the construction of wood ships, refused a permit in the United States, went to Canada. Now, as to steel ships, in corroboration of the assertion I made:

Second. On the same day war-time restrictions upon the construction of steel ships in American yards for domestic account were removed, but the restrictions upon such construction for foreign account have not been removed.

The authoritative information which I have is that France is willing to place contracts for 2,000,000 tons of steel ships in American yards if the Shipping Board, which we have maintained at so much expense, will allow them to do so. As a primary step in reconstruction we should at once take from the Shipping Board all capacity to inflict such industrial injury upon us.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator has anticipated in a way some remarks I had prepared to submit to the Senate in a day or two. I think it very opportune, however, in connection with what he has said for me to call attention to the real reason why our shipyards have not been open to the construction of steel ships on foreign account. The Shipping Board give the reason for it in their report on a resolution which I introduced, and I desire to bring it out very clearly. The Shipping Board, that is, the members of the Shipping Board who are here, are in favor of removing this restriction. They are in favor of allowing persons to build steel ships for foreign account in this country without getting permits from the Shipping Board. This is made clear in a letter sent to the Committee on Commerce a day or two ago by the acting chairman of this board in reporting upon the bill which I introduced to permit the construction of these ships without getting such permits. The letter is signed by John A. Donald, the acting chairman of the Shipping Board, and this is what he says:

I may say that ever since the signing of the armistice the board has been constantly giving its interested attention to the subject fixed upon by this bill. Those of us who are here are quite firmly of the conviction that permission should be granted to American yards for the construction therein of vessels for approved foreign account.

Then he goes on to say, showing why the board can not do what he thinks ought to be done:

On the same day war-time restrictions upon the construction of steel ships in American yards for domestic account were removed, but the restriction upon such construction for foreign account has not been removed. This restriction remains in force temporarily by direction of the President, whose delegate the Shipping Board is in the exercise of his authority.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thank the Senator for that information. That policy, from a standpoint of business ability, is equal to the strategy of the Shipping Board in solving the question of the high cost of ships by striking off their books $1,250,000,000 of cost. That is one of the most masterly financial achievements I have ever known.

Mr. President, I started to say that I am in favor of demobilizing as rapidly as possible this vast structure of war power—the National Council of Defense, the War Trade Board, the War Industries Board, the Committee on Public Information, the censorship, the Food Commission, the Fuel Commission, the Railroad, Cable, Telephone, and Telegraph Administrations, and the repeal of the Overman bill. All need for that vast war structure has passed.

The other day I received a letter from a constituent in Spokane inclosing a request that came from the Committee on Public Information, asking for subscription to the Official Bulletin. There should be no official gazette in the United States. Publishing a newspaper is no proper function of the Government in time of peace. The inevitable tendency of such a bulletin is to bolster up its employers, who are the administration in power.

We do not know the situation in Europe to-day because of the censorship. The United States ought to be contributing its influence in the situation toward the dissemination of news, toward the spreading of light, not toward its suppression. And yet a part of the American equipment is an elaborate censorship.

The discussion which has taken place in the Senate to-day illustrates the evils of that sort of suppression of information. We do not know where the populations are, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] admits, that will be relieved by this $100,000,000. Yet I find, Mr. President, a publication under date of January 17, which bears every evidence of reliability and accuracy, that indicates to some extent the proposition which I stated a moment ago, that directly or indirectly food which would be released, whether that which is purchased or that which is substituted for it, under this appropriation is going to Germany. The American people will not approve—after the losses which they have suffered and the sacrifices which they have made, in a war which was wantonly forced upon them, a war which was deliberately launched upon the world by Germany, which is in a better condition to-day than any other country in Europe—the imposition of this tax to give more food to the German people, who had no sympathy for the starving children of Belgium:

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN, January 17.

Ira Nelson Morris, American minister to Sweden, has just received a cable from Herbert C. Hoover in Paris that is likely to cause the shipment of food to be distributed among the sick and poor in Germany soon. Just before Christmas Prince Carl asked Mr. Morris, on behalf of the Swedish Red Cross, if permission could be obtained for the Swedish Red Cross to take food into Germany. Assent, on conditions that probably will be accepted, is now given.

The cable reads:

"If the Swedish Red Cross desires to purchase foodstuffs for distribution in Germany, particularly pork—

You see, they are arranging to keep up the market for pork, of which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] spoke—we can arrange to sell them a quantity of meat and cereals at once from the stocks we are shipping in bond to Holland, and will take steps to secure a relaxation of the restrictions.—Hoover."

It was some six weeks or two months ago that I received the information that food was to be gotten into Germany by sending it into neutral countries surrounding Germany. This dispatch of January 17 bears out that information and shows that the purpose is being accomplished.

I have looked all through the Constitution of the United States to see if I could find there any authority for this appropriation. There is not in the Constitution any authority to appropriate money for a humanitarian purpose in Europe. The people of Europe are not as bad off as might be thought from the impassioned appeals we hear for their relief; but even if they were, let those who seek to relieve their wants relieve them from their own pockets and not from somebody else's pockets. There are a great many people in this country who might not want to contribute money out of their hard earnings for charity in Europe.

I ask, Senators, as trustees of the American people, do you want to compel them to do it? It is the same as compulsion by force of arms, because ultimately it is a gun that is behind the act. The Army and Navy, the militia, and the marshals of the United States are behind the enforcement of this bill, if we pass it, to take from our people $100,000,000 and bestow it for charity in Europe. We have not any authority to do that.

The only legal ground upon which it has been placed is the claim that it is a war power. I do not think it is fair to ourselves to make any such excuse as that. We know it is not for the prosecution of the war. We know that there is no menace of actual war against us in Europe, nor prospect of any, and that a mere nominal state of war exists.

The President says you can not stop Bolshevism by force, but you can stop it by food. On the contrary, it is probable that it can only be stopped by force; but the United States is under no obligation and has no authority to suppress internal Bolshevism in Europe. The Bolsheviki are madmen and they will destroy food, as it is their declared purpose to destroy other forms of property, as well as life itself. They are engaged in an orgy of loot and rapine, and in Russia, at least, will soon subside from their exhaustion and many of them will perish in their own destruction. The Bolshevists have announced that they purpose not to feed the people of Poland but to exterminate them.

Some Bolshevists got into the American Army and refused to obey military orders, and when put in the guardhouse went on a hunger strike. They were not seeking food nor was their Bolshevism due to lack of food. It was mere natural depravity and pro-Germanism masquerading in the guise of pacifism.

You can not stop Bolshevists with food. I think the President is mistaken when he says you can not stop them by force. Bolshevists believe in force and respect it. That is the only thing they do believe in or respect. They are direct actionists.

Bolshevists have made war in the United States not only by sabotage but by undertaking to defeat the administration of law. There is a man in jail in San Francisco now who goes by the name of Mooney. He was convicted in due process of law of placing a suit case filled with dynamite at the corner of a street while a preparedness parade was passing, with a timed fuse that exploded the dynamite at a certain moment. It killed 10 people and grievously wounded thirty-odd others. He was defended in court by able counsel. A committee, which was appointed by the President of the United States, composed very largely of men connected with labor unions and so not prejudiced against labor, investigated the case, and in a report which I read in part to the Senate on a previous occasion reported that this man was what I interpret to be a professional murderer; that is, they reported that he believed in direct action, which means dynamite, destruction, force, for the settlement of political questions.

The Bolshevists, for whose relief we propose to appropriate $100,000,000, have made an attack upon the processes of the courts of California, and the President, just as he did when he asked us to give up our rights in the Panama Canal to aid him in the adjustment of our foreign relations, asked the governor of California to set aside the decrees of the courts of that State and grant a new trial to this professional murderer because of a foreign agitation and demand made by the Bolshevists of Russia.

As I said before, if we yield to them, and continue to yield to that sort of demand, we will have in the course of time no law, no order, no canal, no property, no security, no opportunity, no liberty in the United States.

Mr. President, strange as it may seem, a section of the Constitution is a news item nowadays. It is an almost forgotten instrument. The tenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

There is no power to relieve the wants of Europe unless it is expressly stated in the Constitution as among the powers of Congress. There is no such statement. Congress has only those enumerated powers with which the Senate is entirely familiar, and this is not one of them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If this appropriation would in fact promote the welfare of the American people there, would there not be some constitutional authority for it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I do not agree to that construction. Under such a construction all the specific provisions of the Constitution would become perfectly meaningless. There would be little occasion to have a constitution at all if the only limitation of government was the "general welfare" of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. I will ask the Senator from Washington if he does not recognize the distinction between legislation restricting rights of the citizens and legislation making appropriations, and whether it is not a distinction well recognized by numberless decisions of the Supreme Court?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is rather irrelevant, it seems to me, to the specific question here. Whatever might be the importance of that distinction, certainly the right of a citizen is restricted if you take money out of his pocket and appropriate it to be sent to Europe. There can not be any power in Congress that is more important or substantial in its effect, not only upon rights of the individual but the country as well, than the appropriation of money. One of the important rights of citizenship is the property right—the right not to be taxed except for specific purposes, upon which Congress is authorized to act. There can not be anything more substantially affecting his rights than appropriation acts.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, may I ask the Senator another question? Where does the Senator find authority in Congress to appropriate money to eradicate the hog cholera, for instance, in the States?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have never introduced a bill to eradicate hog cholera. One advantage that such an act has is that it would apply, as stated by the Senator, in the United States instead of to Europe; and Europe is a great, wealthy, powerful part of the world, and in my opinion, now that the war is won, is fully able to take care of itself.

Great Britain, with her new colonies and possessions she has acquired—great Provinces in Asia and Africa, full of natural resources and wealth—with the reestablishment of commercial relations between herself and her independent dominions, such as Australia and Canada, is more powerful, more wealthy, more able to take care of the problems which shall arise in her neighborhood than ever before.

France has been very fortunate in having a number of statesmen generals, and one of them is the great general who formulated the terms of peace for Bulgaria, who, after he had acquired military supremacy over that enemy, showed his statesmanship on every line that was written; and another one is the immortal Ferdinand Foch. I noticed the other day that Marshal Foch stated that hereafter the "watch on the Rhine" would be kept by France, and that hereafter France would be protected by her natural frontier. Alsace and Lorraine have been returned to her. She undoubtedly will administer a free and benevolent government over Syria and perhaps a part of the African colonies which have been taken from Germany.

There is no doubt that France—with one hand upon the Mediterranean, another on the North Sea, open to the Atlantic; with her resources drawn from every quarter of the globe, her territories vastly increased by great principalities—will be richer and more powerful, more able to meet the demands of Europe than she has ever been before.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If we appropriate money from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of feeding the people of Europe in order to eliminate Bolshevism or to restrain its spread, may we not just as appropriately, and perhaps more wisely, appropriate money from the United States Treasury for the purpose of establishing schools and educational systems in Europe in order to eliminate it from their minds and have a complete European educational system conducted by the United States in order to prevent the spread of that theory or that doctrine which we claim to be inimical to the United States?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that that is a very illuminating suggestion of the Senator from Idaho. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, not to prolong the discussion, but knowing his reputation as a lawyer and to get the benefit of his opinion, whether he thinks that it is proper to bestow charity upon the people of Europe, whether it is within the power of the Congress?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President; I do not; but I did not argue that question for the reason that I have been here too long to interpose a constitutional objection to the desire to appropriate a hundred million dollars. The odds are too great against the Constitution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator from Idaho, if we are appropriating it for ourselves or if it is to be expended in our own communities, but I am more hopeful when it comes to sending it across the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. BORAH. I congratulate the Senator upon his courage, and I shall not criticize him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like before this matter is disposed of to hear the Senator from Virginia or somebody who, at the behest of the President—for the President is the moving influence that is bringing this legislation forth; it is not the Senator from Virginia; it is the President; he is the advocate, the originator, the instigator of this appropriation of a hundred million dollars—I should like to have the Senator from Virginia before he asks the Senate to vote on this bill to tell us and to tell the American people what sort of taxes he is going to propose to levy on the American people to raise this hundred million dollars, which is obviously beyond the program of expenditures which we have prepared for. Where are you going to get it? Where is this $100,000,000 coming from? It is rather curious that we are hastening to expend the money, without having given a moment's consideration as to what class of our people, what form of industry or wealth, is to bear the burden.

Mr. President, if we are to tax the American people $100,000,000, instead of going outside of the legitimate field of the destinies and fortunes of the American Republic and involving ourselves in the intricate affairs of Europe, let us take the $100,000,000 and relieve the pressing wants of the American soldiers who are being discharged from day to day without funds and without employment. It would go a long way in that direction. It would give a month's salary to 3,000,000 soldiers.

More than that, if we are to levy this extra tax upon industry or upon consumption, instead of sending it across the Atlantic Ocean to unknown lands and to unknown peoples, when the leaders of our allies have not asked for it—instead of doing that, why not devote it to the program of the reclamation of the arid lands of the United States, and give farms to the returning soldiers, on which they may make their homes and raise their families in peace and prosperity, if they desire to make their living from the soil; to make the desert fertile; to increase the productive resources of the Nation?

Mr. President, this $100,000,000 which it is proposed to take from the Public Treasury and send to Europe would build a hard-surfaced road for military and commercial uses, and especially for the benefit of the rural communities, increasing the comfort and prosperity of farmers and of our country communities, from north to south along the Atlantic coast; from the East to the West, along the Gulf and the Mexican border, to the Pacific Ocean; and then along the Pacific coast to the Canadian line, and from there to New York City. If we are so free with the money that is in the Treasury, why not take it and use it for one of these great purposes, not only for the benefit of those now here but offering here greater opportunities for desirable immigrants from other lands?

Mr. President, instead of spending $100,000,000 of the American people to conclude terms of peace, we ought to be collecting something like $25,000,000,000 or $30,000,000,000 from Germany to repay us for the cost of the war which she forced upon the world. France is going to have an indemnity—not only reparation, but restitution; not only the return of stolen property, but the payment of the expense which she has been compelled to make in fighting for her life; England is going to have an indemnity and reparation for the cost of the war; Belgium is going to have an indemnity; but the United States, I am very much afraid, under the leadership which is now in power, is going to be presented with a treaty which will give us no indemnity.

It is said by them that we must walk upon a high plane of idealism. Why, there is no idealism, Mr. President, that is worthy of the admiration of mankind that is not based upon a sound material foundation. When we have expended of our goods to develop an Army and Navy and transport them to Europe to fight the battle of civilization, the country which forced the world into that war should be compelled to make restitution.

I want to say to the Democratic administration that if it presents to the Senate a treaty which provides indemnity for our allies, but no indemnity for our own people, the administration will have to meet that issue before the American people. But, unfortunately, while they may punish the administration, it will be too late to recover the indemnity to which they are entitled.

Mr. President, this measure is unconstitutional. It is unwarranted by the situation which exists in Europe. If there is a condition there that needs relief, Europe is fully able to care for it. The purpose and policy of the United States should be to conclude peace, to withdraw from Europe, and live hereafter in peace and amity with that continent, but to leave to the Old World the solution of those problems which are peculiar to that hemisphere, while we endeavor to perform our neglected duties in this.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to put in the RECORD a matter that was brought out a short time ago. The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] asked me if I wished to suppress certain facts. I assured him that I did not, and called his attention to the fact that all the matters he had referred to which needed investigation had already been investigated not only by Democrats but by leading Republicans. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] then asked me what had become of the recommendation of Judge Hughes that a certain officer engaged in aeroplane production—Col. Deeds—should be court-martialed. I told the distinguished Senator what was true, that I did not know; but since then I have been informed that the recommendation of Judge Hughes was referred by the Secretary of War to the Judge Advocate General's department; that the Judge Advocate General had referred the charges to a board of three distinguished judge advocates general—Messrs. Millar, Tucker, and Keedy. They have recently filed their report, in which they say they have fully investigated the evidence submitted by Judge Hughes, which was submitted to him, and that which was submitted by others, and say:

6. The conclusion of this office is, therefore, that Col. Edward A. Deeds should not be tried by court-martial on account of any of the transactions discussed in this memorandum.

In submitting that information I do not pass upon the evidence or on the correctness of the judgment. I merely call attention to the fact that the matter was submitted to the law department of the War Department, who have considered it, and have made a report that court-martial proceedings should not be instituted.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me to make the suggestion of the absence of a quorum? I desire a fuller attendance of the Senate to hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator desires to do so, I will yield, although I have an engagement which makes me anxious to conclude my remarks. I am not going to speak long.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I will postpone the suggestion for the moment, yielding to the wishes of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I shall not occupy very much of the time of the Senate in discussing this measure, because, if there is not some curtailment of debate here, the starving people of Europe will have starved before we take action.

Before saying what I have in mind to say, I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] that while the explanation he has just offered relative to the investigation of the airplane situation may be satisfactory to the War Department it can not possibly be satisfactory to the people of this country. There is no doubt that a large amount of money was wasted in the airplane program. That investigation was made by a man who, perhaps, is the most competent analyzer in this country, and he, an ex-Justice of the Supreme Court, as a result of his examinations recommended that one man be court-martialed and severely criticized others. I think it would have been a matter of good policy as well as judgment for the War Department to have carried out that recommendation, so that there might at least have been one demonstration that an effort was to be made to punish those responsible for such careless and wasteful expenditures.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to confess that I have not entirely satisfied my own mind about the entire worthiness of this appropriation, but I have decided to give it my support. There have been many questions discussed on the floor of the Senate which may or may not have some bearing on it; at any rate some of them have, and, by a stretch of construction, all of them may have; but I do not think many of them should have been raised in opposition to this particular appropriation. I wish, however, to refer to one or two of them, because I think they have some pertinency.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] this afternoon, in his forceful way, was expressing the feeling that we have some responsibility to our returned soldiers; that they should certainly be provided with work, even if we have to neglect the suffering people of Europe. I entirely agree with him in that statement; and, of course, we are going to provide for those men in some way at some time somehow. The trouble is that the paper work of the War Department has entirely broken down so far as the payment of our soldiers is concerned. There are innumerable men on the other side wearing the khaki who have not received any pay since they have been in the service. There are tens of thousands of them who have not had a cent of pay since last July, when the system of paying dependents was changed. Those men are coming back to this country in great numbers without any money in their pockets, many of them without any places of employment; and it is not surprising that some of them are suffering.

I suggested to the Senator from California that if the policy suggested last fall had been followed possibly these men might have been provided for, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to that policy. I refer to the resolution I introduced in the Senate on the 27th of September, 1918, and which related, among other things, to the question of labor. I was led to introduce the resolution because I knew that European Governments were and had been for substantially a year making careful preparation not only in connection with matters relating to labor but in connection with every other question developed during the prosecution of the war. They have made pretty circumspect plans for taking care of their returned soldiers, discharged war workers, and others who have been connected with the various war employments.

In this resolution article 1 related to the labor problem, and it included:

Unemployment which may follow the war; utilization of discharged soldiers and sailors in civil employments; conciliation and arbitration of labor disputes; the relation of men and women in similar employments; substitution of female employees for male, and vice versa; feasibility of organizing permanent employment agencies; requirements for labor after the war, both in agricultural and industrial occupations; distribution of labor; employment of surplus labor on public works of which the construction or completion has been suspended due to the war.

That resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee. It will be seen that it covered every phase of the labor question, and even then, although it was probably too late, if we had gone consistently to work and provided for the construction of public works, or in other ways, these men might have had employment awaiting them upon their discharge from the service.

Within two or three days another resolution, somewhat in the same form but fundamentally different, was presented to the Senate by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. Both of those resolutions, the latter a substitute for the one I introduced, have been lying in the committee ever since. They were referred to a subcommittee, but there has been no possibility, I am told by members of that subcommittee, of getting them considered. No meeting of the subcommittee has been called for weeks, although during the last three or four weeks practically every day attempts have been made to get a hearing on these resolutions. In other words, in relation to the men who have been our defenders and in every question relating to after-war conditions we are drifting in exactly the same way we drifted before the war. We are no better prepared—in fact, not as well prepared—for peace as we were for war when it was declared. I say that because I want it distinctly understood that if reasonable prudence had been used, in my judgment we could have provided for and prevented some of the conditions very properly called to the attention of the Senate this afternoon by the Senator from California.

One of the questions bearing on this whole subject which disturbs me quite as much as any other is the old question of our financial obligations. Anybody who has given that subject any thought must have a great deal of solicitude about our financial future. We have become involved in an indebtedness twenty-five times greater than that we had at the beginning of the war, and we have reached a point where, if we do not issue bonds in time of profound peace to carry on this Government, it will be necessary for us in the future to levy even heavier taxes than those proposed for this year. The situation is such that economy is absolutely necessary wherever it can be practiced; and Members of the Senate must keep that fact in mind in considering appropriations.

We are not getting back to peace conditions as rapidly as we ought to. There are more than 400,000 men in the Navy to-day, and practically all the ships in commission during the war are still in commission. If we had the figures before us, I think we would find that the expenses for the Navy have only been lessened in a slight degree since the end of the war. There are some reasons, to be sure, for not discharging more men. There is the desirability and necessity of manning the German transports to bring back our soldiers from the other side, and there are other reasons; but what should be done is to bring the Navy and every other activity of our military, naval, and civil establishments at once down to a normal and reasonable basis, or else we will have great difficulties with our financial situation. When we add $100,000,000 to that difficulty, it should make any sane and reasonable man stop to consider whether or not we can properly afford it.

There have been criticisms made of Mr. Hoover and others associated with him. My own judgment is that, however much Mr. Hoover may be criticized for his relations with packing establishments and others, in the final analysis the packers were the only people from whom he could make the purchases necessary. Moreover, he went into a new place, a most difficult and important place, and after two years' administration of that office he has escaped with a minimum of criticism, and I think, probably, more criticism than he has deserved. It was almost a hopeless undertaking, in my opinion, to conduct the great untried operations in which he was involved without some degree of criticism; but if I were turning to-day, so far as I personally am concerned, to find a man in this country to put in charge of a great food-distribution work like the one proposed in Europe, he is the first man to whom I would give consideration. Moreover, it must be remembered by those opposed to this legislation that this activity is already under way on the other side; that the interallied committee or commission is conducting this service; and that Mr. Hoover and Mr. Davis are there on the ground. They have all the information before them which is obtainable, and they are ready to carry out this work at once and do so, I think, as wisely as it could be carried out by any man.

It has been suggested that this is charity; and Senators have urged that we should obtain some kind of an evidence of indebtedness from the countries where this food is to be distributed. I assume, of course, that that will be done in every country where there is an organized government. I presume there will be food distributed in countries where there are no organized governments; and yet, even in that case, I believe that evidence can be obtained that the food has been sent there and distributed, and if a responsible government is ever organized, that government will recognize its indebtedness for the food furnished its citizens. I think we may look forward with confidence in the end to getting back the major part, if not all, of this appropriation. I do not think it is an entire loss. It may be prudent to charge it off, but that there will be a comeback I have not the slightest doubt.

The real question, Mr. President, is what is the real situation in Europe, and what are we going to do to help complete the negotiations necessary to end the war? The war is not over yet. We have not made peace. We have a great army of nearly 2,000,000 men on the other side. We want to get those men back home; and it may be decided by those in better position to know than most of us that it is not safe to bring those men back until a definite peace has been made. I want to see every soldier wearing the American uniform return to this country as rapidly as possible. I do not want him delayed because of the necessary expenditure of $100,000,000. This entire expenditure would be only $50 apiece for those 2,000,000 men to get them home. Every mother and father and family, as well as every man on the other side, is insistent that they get back as quickly as possible; and if this will help in any degree to bring about a sound condition in Europe which will expedite a justifiable peace, then there is ample reason for our making the appropriation.

That there are starving people over there goes almost without saying. I do not think anybody knows exactly about the conditions in most of the countries in the central part of Europe. If the information were obtainable, I think it would be found, for example, that there is food enough in Russia. The difficulty is the distribution of the food; and then the question may arise, How are we going to distribute food if it can not be done under present conditions? And I have no answer to that question. I do not know; but, in any case, we should use every effort to distribute the food that is in Russia in that country. I have a feeling, however, that in Poland and that section of Europe there is the greatest distress; and one of the things that must come out of this peace treaty is the creation of a government between Germany and the East strong enough to present an effective barrier to the activities of the German nation in that direction.

It has been said here to-day, I think by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], for example, that the Bolshevist can not be cured by giving him food; that he would destroy food; that that is his disposition; that is what he wants to do; and I think probably the Senator is right. He can not utter any sentences too strong for me in his condemnation of the Bolshevist movement; and yet we want to prevent other men from becoming Bolshevists. When a man has an empty stomach he listens to that kind of reasoning much more readily than he does under other conditions. There are great numbers of people in Europe, in my judgment, who will readily listen to that argument unless somebody comes to their relief and gets them into a physical condition which will stimulate a sane and reasonable mental condition.

I do not know about our allies; I do not know about the food conditions in France and Italy; but, in my judgment, no part of this proposed expenditure should be made until a firm arrangement has been entered into by the President with our allies for them to do their part. It is estimated that $350,000,000, in the form of a revolving fund, will be necessary to carry out what is now contemplated. If that is true, then $100,000,000 would be about our share; but no part of that $100,000,000, in my judgment, should be expended until an agreement has been made with the other nations, whose interest in the desirability of carrying out this enterprise is quite as important as ours, to do their part.

I doubt very much the practicability of putting that in the bill, and therefore I suggested in the Committee on Appropriations that that view should be expressed to the President by the chairman of the committee, and I assume that that will or has been done. He certainly should be advised that we do not want to be put in the position of being considered as having an exhaustless Treasury, even by those who have been and are our friends; but in this matter everybody should do his share, based on his own interests and on the necessities of the situation.

When we take the whole question by and large, when we consider that the President is on the other side representing the United States, when he is on the ground and knows the situation, when he is presumably going to make every effort to bring about a just peace, I think we are rather in duty bound to take one more of these steps which have always been accompanied by the "trust me" statement since the beginning of the war. I do not wonder that Senators are irritated by the situation. I do not wonder that they hesitate about doing it when they think of all the arguments which may be made against it; but I do think that there is ample reason in this case, considering our situation in Europe—the fact that the war is not over, the fact that we want to get our soldiers home as speedily as possible—for our supporting this appropriation, and as far as I am concerned I have concluded to follow that course.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have been quite reluctant to inject myself into the discussion of the pending measure, because I have a very abiding conviction that the world is already suffering from too much talk; but I am in such a state of hesitancy about my vote on this bill that I thought perhaps if I ventured some remarks about the motives which are impelling me I might arrive at a decision for myself.

I very much doubt whether there is a Senator on this floor who cordially approves of this measure, and at the same time I doubt if there is a Senator on the floor who, from any partisan motive or any hostility to the war administration, wishes to vote against it. Frankly, I am finding difficulty to know what I ought to do.

I do not think an ideal is any less commendable or less admirable if it is one of old creation, if it has been borrowed or re-created or commandeered or conscripted or capitalized; but I do think, Senators, that just now there is an excess of idealism in the politics of the world and not enough of the practical. I would not have a civilization without idealism. I would not want a republic without impelling and inspiring ideals, but I should like for a little while to see the American Republic following the lines of common-sense practicality. I was moved to this thought this morning when the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was engaged in a colloquy with one of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, when he suggested that the passage of this bill would so expedite the return of the American armies from Europe that we would probably save the sum involved by hastening the return of our soldiers only three days.

Why, Mr. President, if expedition of the return of our soldiers will save $100,000,000 in three days or a week, the practical course long since would have been to have driven through a treaty of peace and saved five times that sum already. The difficulty about the situation is that in our committal to the ideal, in this wandering in a maze of dreams, we have forgotten the practical things; we have gotten far adrift on the reasons why we went to war, and it is a curious illustration of one of the inherent weaknesses of popular government.

I talked to a soldier the other day, a very intelligent returned soldier, and I asked him, without irony in my speech, if he was not rejoiced at the American triumph and the victorious fight he had made for the President's 14 points of peace; and, like the practical fellow that he was, he said, "Hell, no! I don't even know what they are."

I said, "Why, it is the impression that you were fighting to carry out the ideals of the Chief Executive." He said, "My dear sir, of all the soldiers I know upon the battle fields of France, every mother's son of them was fighting to whip Germany, and, by the eternal, we did it, and we are glad!"

The point I want to make, Mr. President, is that we proclaimed to the world that we were making a war for democracy, and we never would have proclaimed it for a single minute if it had not been for the politics of the moment, when most men in public life were fearful of offending the so-called German vote in the United States of America; and instead of announcing that we were making war on Germany, which had trespassed upon American national rights, we made the excuse that we were making war for democracy, and it has been a lie from the beginning. America never would have gone to war except to battle in defense of American national rights, and there was not another real reason for our going to war; but out of this misstated reason for entering the war we have builded up these idealistic dreams, and then, after bringing about a triumphant cessation of hostilities, instead of clinching the victory won, we have gone on in a maze of idealism and growing delay, and the end is not yet.

I have no objection, Senators, to some form of conception or creation or combination which shall help to guarantee the continued and abiding peace of the world. I am not finding fault with the Chief Executive for his conspicuous and persistent part in seeking this new status of civilized guaranties. I hope he can bring about something of the kind, if he can, without the surrender of our national sovereignty. I do not agree with him in his notions of a new internationalism paralyzed by socialism. I do not agree with him in sowing the seeds he has of a modified and magnified democracy throughout the world. I do not hesitate to say that I think the world to-day, trembling under the menace of Bolshevism, owes a very large part of that growing menace to the policies and utterances of the Chief Executive of the United States.

But I did not mean to discuss that. I rose mainly to make an inquiry. I want to know from the Senator in charge of the bill, and I ask it in very great respect: Is this a measure of war? Is this a measure carrying out a compact with the nations with whom we have been allied in war and are now allied in seeking peace, or is this an American charity? I ask the Senator from Virginia, because I really wish to know.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as I understand, it is an American charity, but an American charity which will largely bring about the consummation of peace. The communications which have come here from the President of the United States have said that there was a rebellious and anarchistic spirit abroad in Europe, which could not be easily conquered by arms, but could be quieted by food.

In other words, Mr. President, it is impossible to treat for peace with governments whose populations are starving. People who are suffering from hunger are in no condition to make peace. They are ready for riot, disorder, and violence; and because of that want of food Bolshevism has taken a hold in Europe which is alarming the entire European countries and alarming our President. In his communication, while he puts it essentially on the ground of relieving suffering and stopping starvation among the people who have been our friends in this war, which we hope is now approaching its final conclusion, while we are intending to relieve them from starvation, the argument is made that in doing that great charity we at the same time will consummate the peace for which we have been fighting, and which we have almost completely accomplished. The finishing feature of the contest in which we have been engaged for about 18 months is the peace treaties, and we must have better order in certain European countries than exists there now before we can negotiate final treaties of peace.

So, to answer the question in a few words, this is essentially a charity. It is intended to save the suffering people in Europe from starvation; but the argument is made in addition that in relieving them from starvation we will consummate the peace which we all desire.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I made an observation at this point?

Mr. HARDING. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Virginia says this is for the purpose of consummating peace—with the enemy, I presume. We are not making peace with anyone else; and yet we have the specific understanding that not a dollar of this money is to be permitted to reach those with whom we are obligated to make peace or with whom we have been at war. Now, the fact is that it has nothing at all to do with the question of making peace, and the President's cablegrams can not be so construed. It is argued that the friendly peoples in Europe are so unsettled and so unstabilized that governments can not be set up there, or can not be arranged for, until they are fed; and the basic principle is that we propose to feed Europe into a state of stability.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will read a few lines from the cablegram received from the President:

> Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, has overwhelmed Poland, and is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food, and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance.

That is a part of it. I do not want to take the time to read it all. That is a part of a cablegram from the President. There are people that we expect to unite in these treaties of peace that were not active belligerents in the war, but in order to restore peace and good will among the European countries, the good will which will perpetuate peace, it is necessary to have parties to that treaty who were not on the battle line; and it is believed that it is vitally important, in order to consummate that purpose, that starvation should be stopped in these European countries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say that it is not of any very great material importance whether we get the consent of Germany and of German Austria to a treaty of peace or not. We can take it for granted that they are going to give their consent, because they have acknowledged themselves whipped, and that is the end of it. The President, in talking about stabilizing conditions so that we may have peoples with whom we could deal, spoke, in the very language of his message, of "the liberated peoples of Europe," excluding the peoples of Germany and of German Austria.

You can not arrive at any ultimate conclusion so long as Bolshevism is controlling either Poland or Russia. You can not arrive at any ultimate conclusion founded upon reason so long as Armenians and Syrians and Jews and Arabs are starving in Asia Minor. In short, Mr. President, you can not talk to nor reason with a hungry stomach.

I heard somebody this morning say—I think it was the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]—that he disagreed with the President, and that he thought the only way to whip bolshevism was to shoot it to death, and that you could not feed it to death. Perhaps you can not feed Bolshevism to death, but you can feed the receptivity to Bolshevistic doctrines to death; and the only danger about Bolshevistic or anarchistic or nihilistic doctrines anywhere in the world is that they are directed to the mind of a man whose stomach is hungry and whose reason is inactive. If the Senator from Idaho were starving or I, either one, a man would have a mighty slow time reasoning with us, because we would be hunting something to eat.

Now, what the President means is that he wants to give this food to the liberated peoples over there. Who are they? The Poles, the Czecho-Slovaks, the Jugo-Slavs, the inhabitants of northwestern France, the inhabitants of Belgium, the inhabitants of Serbia, and all of these people who have not been our real enemies, although they have been component parts or conquered territory of our enemy during this war; and any Senator is very much mistaken who thinks that at the present price of ammunition it is cheaper to kill a man than it is to feed him.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi is correct and this fund is to relieve the liberated peoples of Europe, and we were sincere in our proclamation against autocracy, then we ought to apply this fund to the relief of the liberated peoples of Austria-Hungary and the German Empire. If the Senator from Virginia is correct and this bill is in the main a bounty of American generosity in a charitable intent——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I perhaps did not make myself fully understood. It is a charity for the time being, but my impression and belief is that the major part of it, nearly all of it, will be returned. It is to be advanced to those people to relieve their suffering until they can support themselves, and it is confidently expected that nearly all of it will be returned.

Mr. HARDING. I am sure I have not misunderstood the Senator, but I do not wish to contend for a moment concerning the return of the money. If we were granting a charity, I should very much hesitate to grant it with a snarl on my lips.

Mr. President, I can not vote for this measure as a manifestation of American generosity and charity with the limitations which have been put in the bill. I was ready to go as far as any man on this floor in any measure of starvation aimed at the peoples of Germany and Austria so long as we were at war, but when the war is ended and out of the fullness of the American charity we mean to aid in feeding the suffering and starving of the world I would despise myself if I were not content to grant from our stores to the starving of Germany and Austria as well as the Bolsheviki in Russia who betrayed the allied nations in the war.

Mr. President, through somebody's advocacy—and I am not seeking to take issue with any on this side of the floor or the other—we have written into this bill a prohibition of relief in Bulgaria and in Turkey, with which nations we have at no time formally been at war. If we are going to indulge in mercy and help a suffering people out of the abundance of the American storehouse, I want somebody to tell me why the starving mouth in Germany and Austria should not be administered to as well as that in Bulgaria and in Turkey.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARDING. I am very willing to be interrupted, and I yield first to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Germany is not suffering for food. The President in one of his cablegrams says that none of it is to be used in Germany. He says Germany has plenty of money to buy the food she needs.

Mr. PENROSE. Then why prohibit it?

Mr. HARDING. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is useless for me to answer the question, because the Senator from Virginia has done it. Starvation does not exist amongst our enemies. It exists among the liberated people who were subject to the tyranny of our enemies.

Mr. HARDING. Then will the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Virginia tell me why we have written into the bill a prohibition of the use of any of this fund in Germany or Bulgaria or Turkey or Austria-Hungary?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do you mean the German part of Austria-Hungary? Hungary has a surplus of food right now.

Mr. PENROSE. Then why prohibit it?

Mr. HARDING. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment which has been inserted in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, beginning at line 3, the bill reads:

That for the participation by the Government of the United States in the furnishing of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies, and for the transportation, distribution, and administration thereof to such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto.

After "thereto" have been added the words:

including the Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, and other Christian and Jewish populations of Asia-Minor now subject to Turkey.

Then the bill reads, "outside of Germany," and after the words "outside of Germany" there has been inserted "German Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I confess to the Senator that I did not know the words "German Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey" had been inserted, and I suppose the object of the Senate in inserting them was to include the liberated peoples who were subject to the central empires and not our enemies.

Mr. HARDING. The point I wish to make clear is that the war is one thing and that charity bestowed upon starving humanity is another thing. If we are to reach into the abundance of the American stores, let us not strain the qualities of American generosity and charity. If the measure is not of charity and is a war necessity, with which we are in agreement with the chief nations with whom we have been associated in the war, namely, Great Britain and France, why was it not feasible and practical to found the bill on the coordinated action of these nations, each bearing their burden in the matter? I think there would have been no hesitancy then to promptly place this sum at the disposal of the American peace commission abroad or the commission representing the allied nations. It appears to be a sum indiscriminately passed out to stay the tide of bolshevism.

I wish to put into the RECORD now my own conviction that you can not buy permanent tranquillity with cash or food anywhere in the world, and you can not stabilize the world with the breath of charity, and you can not shower the world with gold and harvest contentment therefrom, because every experiment of that kind which has ever been made calls for the renewal of the shower; and you can not reach practical results through an avenue of dreams. There is no rhetorical route to the reestablishment of normal conditions in the world. Quite as important as the adoption of the practical is the understanding at what convictions the world has arrived concerning our present-day civilization.

Mr. President, there has been much proclamation about the destruction of class rule in the world, and it is very manifest that autocracy is passing from its place in the domination of human affairs; but I want to know if we are going to encourage the drift to the establishment of another class rule in this new civilization which is to come. Little is gained, in my judgment, if you destroy the rule of one class and substitute another. I make bold to say it now, though there are mighty few men seemingly willing to say it, that you can not have popular government dictated by the might or force of physical numbers.

It will fail anywhere on the earth where it is ever attempted, and the man who proposes to substitute for deliberate and intelligent public opinion, who proposes to substitute for character and discipline and thrift and industry and intelligent understanding, the rule of mere physical might will bring on the wreck of the world's civilization. The trouble is that in this uncertain pursuit of modern idealism we are adrift in that direction.

I am not imputing to the President of the United States in his trip abroad any questionable motive. Mr. President, I have never been one to criticize the trip abroad of the President. I am only criticizing the lack of practicality in his journey to Europe. If as the Chief Executive of the United States; if as the premier of the United States, as he has chosen to appoint himself; or if as the chairman of the American peace commission, President Wilson had chosen to go abroad to expedite a treaty of peace which ended the war with Germany, I should have been content to say "Amen"; and if following the formulation of such a compact of peace the President had chosen to make a triumphal tour of Europe and receive the laudation and acclaim which is reasonably and justly his, I believe I would have rejoiced as an American, because there is neither envy nor jealousy in my soul.

The practical thing to have done would have been to go to Europe and hasten the treaty of peace that finally and formally ends the war with Germany. My criticism is that in chasing his dreams of the ideal he has neglected the more essential, and in pursuing the ideal abroad he has neglected the necessary practical things at home here in the United States so essential to our own welfare.

Mr. President, much has been said about the return of the soldiers and about the restoration of the men at arms to their rightful places in the ranks of peace. I know not whether it is true that there are so many returning soldiers seeking their old positions in vain. In many respects that is to me an unbelievable thing. I think I know the spirit of the average American employer, and I know it was a well-adopted policy that those who went from the ranks of the shop to the Army should find their places awaiting them on their return, and I know that those places would be awaiting the return of the soldiers if the Government of the United States would only fix its policy for peace instead of wandering on in a state of uncertainty.

Mr. President, we have been infinitely more neglectful in preparing for the obligations of peace than we were in preparing for the duties of war. There are industrial institutions in the United States to-day that do not have the faintest idea which way to turn because we are lacking in a policy for peace, lacking in plans for readjustment.

I was in a great manufacturing institution the other day which had never sought a single war contract, the services of which essentially were commandeered by the Government, though I ought to say that it willingly gave its services for war production. After the armistice was signed, very properly the production of war materials in that factory ceased, whereupon the managers of this institution asked for the department only to say to them what they might do with the materials that were cluttering up the floors of their workshop and let them return to their own pursuits. Though that was nearly eight weeks ago, there has not been a decision to this day. The wheels of that industry are paralyzed by the failure of the United States Government to fix the policy, and many of the men who ought to be employed in the activities of that industrial institution in normal activities are held out of work. Why? Because of the unwillingness of the industrial institution? No; it is because of the inaction and indecision of the War Department at Washington.

Then there is another thing, and I am speaking ot it, Senators, not to indulge in a series of critical utterances; but I am seeking to show you that there is a practical side and a practical work to do, and somebody ought to be doing it, doing it now, in the absence of the President, with his approval and commendation and consent.

The other day I read a very important utterance from a member of the President's Cabinet, saying that it was unthinkable that there should be any change in the rate of wages paid. Senators, the public official who makes that statement and at the same time cries out for a reduced cost of living is a demagogue in the widest terms that can be named, because you can not reduce the cost of living and maintain the present standard of American wages.

I am just as much in favor of a high standard of wages as any man on this floor. I think the war will have been in vain if we go back to old conditions that existed heretofore. Nay, more, I think the war will have been in vain and our civilization will have failed to meet the new world conditions if we do not have the conscience and the courage and the cooperation to reach a state where henceforth there is a fairer division of the profits of production. If you do not do it, you will have more Bolshevism in the United States of America than there is in the great, pathetic land of Russia.

But the difficulty is that you have men in public life—under the temptations of popular government and popular appeal—proclaiming to maintain war conditions. In all the Republic there is not a man with an ounce of common sense who believes they can be maintained. They can not be. The business of the country is asking for a policy which will enable it to go on with the necessary readjustment.

Speaking of practical things, you are proposing here to spend $100,000,000 only of American money. In the nations enumerated for relief there are 100,000,000 people and more. The proposed appropriation is $1 each. How far do you think you will get in actual relief with $1 each or $2 each when in the United States of America we are complaining about the inability to live when labor is getting a dollar an hour? It is time to be practical and honest with ourselves.

I was very much impressed by the remarks of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] asking for an American policy and an American decision. I do not subscribe to much that has been said about aloofness from entangling alliances in the Old World. I think the time has come when we can not wholly hold ourselves aloof. But I want to say to you, Senators, we can fix an American policy for our activities at home. Why is not somebody giving a thought and proposing a means for practical progress for ourselves?

Not very many men will say it, it is not very popular to say it, but we have taxed in this country the big industrial undertakings until they are almost paralyzed. The men who never produce little understand the burden they are putting on the producer. Why would it not be well as a practical thing, instead of giving so much thought to the expenditure of $100,000,000, to secure some practical means of relief for those who are bearing the burdens of American taxes? We want to encourage, not stop the wheels. Why would it not be feasible, for instance, to take the $9,000,000,000 owed to us by the nations allied with us in war, either directly or indirectly—nearly $9,000,000,000 in round numbers; let me put it at $8,000,000,000 to be sure—the $8,000,000,000 that we have loaned to nations who declared war on the central empires of Europe—why would it not be a practical thing to take this indebtedness of the other nations and turn it into negotiable bonds and sell them to the people of the United States, and in that way relieve the burden which you are putting upon the backs of the manufacturers and the great industrial institutions of this country?

America needs a policy. America needs some reconstruction work at home. America needs an understanding as to what our policy is going to be. Nay, more, America needs, above everything else, an understanding that orderly government is the first essential in the world.

I do not forget, Senators, that in high places in this country, both executive and legislative, we preached the gospel of revolution in the central empires of Europe. We were so eager to make war on constituted authority that we proclaimed revolution as one of the greatest essentials to bring about peace and tranquillity in the world. You lighted a fire then that it is difficult to put out now. If I had to choose for myself between hateful autocracy on the one hand or destroying anarchy and its democracy on the other, if there is no righteous mean between these two hateful extremes, I choose autocracy. We have been encouraging the lighting of the fires of revolution throughout the world without counting the possible cost to ourselves.

In substance, then, what am I seeking to argue? That we stop the futile chasing of ideals—not putting them aside entirely—and hasten the work of bringing about an accepted peace, so that those who are responsible for policies and administration of law in this Republic can turn the attention of our people to the pursuits of peace and restoration and reconstruction. When we have gotten our forces again at work we can stay the march of Bolshevism by appeals to deliberate American understanding.

The man who expects to stop that wave by yielding from the wealth of the world, by feeding temporarily, is chasing a rainbow that has no end. The man who expects by the preachment or the application of charity or through some new and impossible combination that the world has tried again and again without avail, and by that means to bring the world to tranquillity, is marching and shouting in vain.

The big thing to do, Senators, is to get ourselves out of the entanglement into which we went in defense of our American rights, stop this perfectly indefensible discussion about fighting for democracy and the creation of new governments throughout the world, and let us understand that we were fighting for American national rights and to maintain our American civilization. If you do not do it, if you do not get America adjusted to paths of peace within the next 90 days, you will be seeking means of stopping the flame in this country instead of feeding the starving who are contributing to the ranks of Bolshevism in the Old World.

Mr. President, I subscribe to the doctrine enunciated by the Senator from California. Let us have an American policy. Let us devote ourselves to American problems. We can not expect to hold wholly aloof, but we are not half so much concerned about the affairs of Europe as we sometimes pretend to be. It is notoriously true that at the very time we were proclaiming our anxiety about France having the restoration of Alsace and Lorraine—and I for one meant it truly—there were those who were in authority to speak who said privately we were not concerned and never expected to have a part in handing back that territory to the Republic of France.

We concern ourselves about open diplomacy and square dealing and frankness with the world, when the truth is that we are proposing a great Navy and we are proposing to build a limitless merchant marine, merely to paint the scenery for negotiations with the other nations of the earth.

Mr. President, I want to cry out again and again for practical things. I read only this morning that we are building $3,000,000,000 worth of ships at prices necessarily contracted in the emergency of war; we are building them at from $200 to $250 per dead-weight ton, and we are going on now laying keels day after day, proposing to build $2,000,000,000 worth more after the crisis is passed, and while we are so building the head of the United States Shipping Board is proclaiming to the world that we must write off a billion dollars—and practical shipping men say that that is not enough—to permit profitable operation.

Where are we going? What is to be the end? Where is the magic source in this wonderful Treasury that you can spend one, two, three, four, five billion dollars, write it off with a sweep of the pen, and still propose to go on, and do it as a camouflage, let me say, to aid in our negotiations for a favorable compact with the nations of the earth?

Mr. President, if I had my way, and if Congress had the courage on its own initiative, if we had for a moment any confidence in our own convictions, we would say "not another ship at war prices." We ought to say it. Let us finish what we have begun; let us keep our yards and make them a reservoir of employment for the readjustment; let us build ships and use the unemployed, if necessary, to bring about an easy readjustment; but let us not go on at war prices, with enormous profits to the contractors and unnecessary and unfair prices to the laborer. I say it deliberately, Mr. President. It is not fair in American shipyards to pay a wage from 50 to 75 per cent more than we pay in thousands of industrial employments throughout the United States, where the men at work were content to follow their normal pursuits in order to maintain the needed trend of American activities.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDING. I yield.

Mr. REED. In order that I may be sure that I understood the remark of the Senator I desire to ask, Does the Senator understand that any new contracts for ships have been let since the armistice was signed?

Mr. HARDING. No, Mr. President. What I meant to have said was that there are thousands of ships contracted for under the war emergency for which the keels have not yet been laid, for many of which, perhaps, the material is not even yet on the way to the yard.

Mr. REED. The Senator's view, I take it, is that as to those contracts which have not been well started, the work ought to be stopped on the ships in the same manner that work has been stopped by the War Department in the production of war materials?

Mr. HARDING. Precisely so.

Mr. President, I found no fault with the building of ships at a very costly figure to meet the war emergency. We had to have ships, else the Republic failed in its cause in the war. I found no fault with the costly struggle for tonnage. I did not grieve that we paid almost what anybody asked; I did not grieve that labor came in again and again with its demands. I only say it is unfair to the great rank and file of labor throughout the United States to continue our war-time activities in the shipyards at the present rate of compensation.

I would use the shipyards as a means of employment, with a readjusted wage. I would not stop our activities to build up a great merchant marine; but, Mr. President, it is futile to build a merchant marine without a policy for its maintenance and operation, and we have not yet reached that policy, I am sorry to say——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDING. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. Let me add that no sooner had the war ended than Great Britain, whom we well might pattern after as a maritime nation, was ready to release her ships to go seeking and bearing the commerce of the world. We have done nothing of that sort.

Mr. President, if I could fix the policy I would have these scores, yea, these hundreds, of new shipyards in the United States employ American labor at the top price possible to private operation in building ships for the world. What boots it, what advantage is there to us to have the greatest merchant marine in the world, if, under this new idealism, we are to have a compact of nations in the international relationship where there is no competition or no seeking of national eminence, no seeking of American triumph?

Why, it was our Secretary of Commerce who admonished American industry to seek no trade abroad until the world should find itself in a state of comfortable readjustment. If that is the policy I ask why build ships to seek to carry American trade?

Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, what I was going to suggest to the Senator was that it appears that by the devastations of submarines the United Kingdom lost some 8,000,000 tons of shipping and incurred about a million tons of marine loss by mines, and so forth. Great Britain failed to construct ships during the war as she had been doing in previous years, so that she is very short of anything like an adequate merchant marine at the present time. She has not perhaps one-third of the merchant navy that she requires for her own business. She recognizes that it is the opportunity of the age for her competitors in foreign markets to build up a mercantile marine that would supply their own needs in the years to come, and in some measure perhaps cut off some of her own shipping business. Great Britain recognizes that the sensible thing to do—not by way of taking advantage of any other nation or anything of that sort—but that the sensible thing to do for any nation that wants to take its proper place on the seas, that aspires to become in any way a maritime power, is to build ships.

I hope the Senator from Ohio does not mean to contend that we ought to discontinue the construction of ships because wages are high or because it is expensive. That is certainly not the policy of Great Britain. The Senator commends the United Kingdom for its wise course in the past. She had 10,000 vessels flying her flag in every part of the world, and was carrying at least 60 per cent of the world's trade when the war began and 92 per cent of her own trade. The Senator from Ohio commends her course, her genius, her skill, and her wisdom. Great Britain is not failing to build ships now, even at the present prices. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me to extend this interruption just a moment longer, I desire to say I have before me a statement made by the Right Hon. Lord Inchcape, chairman of the Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. Addressing the stockholders at a recent meeting, he said:

> Meanwhile we must go on replenishing our fleet, even at the present high prices. We have arranged for the construction of two large mail and passenger ships with Messrs. Harland & Wolff and have contracted for three steamers with the Messrs. Caird and made provisional arrangements to secure berths with other builders.

That refers merely to one shipping concern. I happened to make a note of that address when I read it last night. It shows that every one of these lines in Great Britain is proceeding to build ships to-day to as great an extent as ever, and more than ever, in fact, in spite of the high prices. Should we not pursue the same course?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit the Senator from Florida to state the difference between the cost of the English ships and the American ships?

Mr. HARDING. I will venture to state it for him.

Mr. President, I had not thought to go into a detailed discussion of the shipping problem, because I am getting far adrift from the line I intended to follow; but I must reply to the Senator from Florida to this extent: I do not want a cessation of shipbuilding activities; I would have them accelerated and magnified; but I do not want to build ships for the merchant marine of the United States of America at from three to four times the normal cost; yea, at nearly three times the cost for which England is building ships under war conditions. It has been very well established that England's shipbuilding activities are being carried on now at a cost of $90 per ton, while in the United States of America, in our shipyards under war pressure, we are paying from $220 to $250 per ton. I think it is perfect folly to spend billions of money out of the Public Treasury of the United States to build ships at from two to three or four times the normal cost after the war emergency has passed. We had better suspend the contracts and let the yards dip into the shipbuilding enterprise on their own account when the world is in fact calling for ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio to allow me to quote from a report of the Shipping Board as to the cost of construction abroad? In a recent report filed January 9 they say:

> Such information about British construction for foreign account as comes to the Shipping Board is circumstantial and unofficial. For example, it is reported that British shipbuilders are offering to construct steel vessels for French and Italian account at prices said to range between $190 to $125 a dead-weight ton, according to whether the vessels are to be delivered in the immediate or distant future.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator state from whose testimony he is reading?

Mr. FLETCHER. This report is signed by the acting chairman of the Shipping Board, John A. Donald. It is in response to a Senate resolution, and was filed January 9, 1919.

Mr. HARDING. I am aware that the statement has been officially or semiofficially made that Great Britain is paying $90 per ton for the construction of ships.

Mr. NELSON. The price the Senator has quoted for American ships does not include overhead charges.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Minnesota suggests that the prices I have quoted, referring to our own ships, do not include overhead expenses. I am prepared to say the statement in reference to the cost of British-built ships is not correct; that the highest price Great Britain has paid for shipbuilding at any period during the war is $90 per ton, and I challenge any authority to contradict the statement I have just made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact stated in this report:

Such information about the British construction for foreign account—

For foreign account—

as comes to the Shipping Board is circumstantial and unofficial.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact, first, that it is circumstantial and unofficial; and, second, that it relates not to the price which Great Britain is paying for building her own ships in her own yards, but the price of the ships she is building for foreign account.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator's statement is entirely in accord with that which I have made. But, Mr. President, even were these things not so, even were there not this marked difference in cost between ships built under war emergencies in the United States and in times of peace, it would be perfect folly to proceed with this enormous war-time construction when we are as yet without a policy for the successful operation of the ships when built, and when there is not a man in connection with the shipping authorities of the United States Government who believes that a single vessel can be maintained in operation except through the aid of a Government subsidy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HARDING. If it is only a question, I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Even independently of a subsidy for operation, how could a ship that cost $250 a ton live in competition upon the mere basis of earning interest upon the original cost with a ship that cost even $190 a ton?

Mr. HARDING. It could not; and I wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I cordially——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then why build dead-weight?

Mr. HARDING. I cordially agree with the Senator that we ought to write off much of the war cost, and I will find no fault thereat. I only complain of the lack of practicability of going on now after the war emergency has passed to build at war-time prices.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not disagreeing with the Senator. I am agreeing with him this far, that if you find that it costs you $250 to build a ship, and at the highest estimate it costs somebody else $190——

Mr. HARDING. No; $90.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or $90—I stated the highest estimate—you simply can not compete with that other man in operating your ship if you are going to be paid the same rate of interest upon your plant. If we are going into this business anyhow, with the idea of taxing all the people of the United States, its wheat farmers and its cotton planters, in order to keep up the operation, we are deliberately building up a system to be paid for at the expense of the taxpayer, and giving only the same rate of profit to the producer.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator and I are in perfect accord, and I invite his voice——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then another idea struck me that does not strike the Senator from Ohio. It never struck me that it made the slightest difference to me who carried my cotton to Timbuctoo, provided it was carried for a sufficiently low rate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator suggests that all of these contracts for wooden ships ought to be canceled, and he speaks particularly of those that are not on the ways. The Senator would not advise the cancellation of a contract for building a ship where, although it might not be on the ways, the lumber entering into its construction had been manufactured and was in the lumber yards ready for delivery, would he?

Mr. HARDING. Yes; I would. I would sell the lumber on the ground. I would dispose of it to the shipbuilder at a sacrifice and let him build ships on his own account.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Sell the lumber and charge up the loss to profit and loss.

Mr. HARDING. Exactly so. That is precisely what I would do with every ship which is not in process of construction.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I differ radically from the Senator in regard to that, because, take it in the Northwest, where at least 10,000 men were engaged in the construction of wooden ships, the Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation, has canceled contracts for at least 40 or 50 ships where the lumber for them had been manufactured, although the ships were not on the ways. The result has been not only great distress among the laboring people—it has released about 10,000 shipbuilders—but it has practically put some of the lumber yards into bankruptcy.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Oregon, with whom I am sorry to be in disagreement, that there is not any remedy for that sort of thing. The American shipyards are filled with workmen from all sections of the country, some of whom left their normal pursuits because of the higher compensation they received, not a few of whom sought the shipyards as a means of avoiding military service; so it is a very natural thing that the shipyards on the east and west coasts, and probably on the southern coasts, are filled with workingmen, where the wage was at the very top notch because of war conditions and exemption from military service and fortunate conditions generally. You can not hope to have readjustments without some hardships.

Mr. President, there are no readjustments following a war that are free from hardships. They will come for the men who wear the uniform, they will come for the American home, they will come for the American employer. No one is free from the trials and denials and losses and distresses that attend the enormous readjustment which follows a war. It is perfect folly to think of such a thing.

And now, Mr. President, having detained the Senate much longer than I thought to do when I rose to my feet, let me say one thing more.

There is a lack of practical procedure. Six months ago there was proposed to this body a responsible plan for readjustment and reconstruction. Instead of accepting the advice or suggestions of the Senate, the Executive frowned upon them and said, "No; I have a plan for reconstruction and readjustment," and the proposals of those of us in the Senate, thought out by many capable and very earnest men dealing with the subject, were turned down. The Executive program was at least accepted by inference; and without a single move toward establishing conditions helpful to reconstruction the President went abroad, and a finger has not been lifted to this day. That is why we are drifting into chaos in the United States. That is why I am making an appeal to the Senate to-day to put aside for a little while the pursuit of the ideal and get down to practical things for the relief of the American Republic.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio, if he will permit me, is not quite accurate with regard to the suggestions for reconstruction. The President proposed—I assume he proposed through the bill introduced by the Senator from North Carolina—that a commission be appointed to take into consideration these very vital problems. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] introduced a resolution which looked to the appointment of joint legislative committees covering the same subject. The Republican conference took into its consideration the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. It was modified somewhat, though not essentially, and in its modified form I had the honor of introducing it into the Senate. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill introduced by the Senator from North Carolina had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill and the resolution were referred by the full committee to a subcommittee, and there they have remained without attention or action.

I say, without the least reflection upon the chairman of that subcommittee, that I have been industriously endeavoring from that time until now to secure a meeting of the subcommittee for the consideration of those two propositions, which differed only in the procedure—the one contemplated an administrative commission and the other contemplated legislative committees—and I have been unable to secure a meeting of the subcommittee. The Senator from North Carolina is not here, and I ought to say in his defense that one of the reasons that he has given for the failure of the subcommittee to meet is that he, as chairman of this German propaganda committee, has been busily engaged in that work. But three weeks ago, four weeks ago, we ought to have had a meeting of the subcommittee, and we ought to have made some report, and the Judiciary Committee ought to have taken some action upon it, and the Senate ought to have the subject before it now. Indeed, it ought to have had it before it long ago.

I rose simply to correct what I thought was an inaccuracy in the statement of the Senator from Ohio when he said that the proposition of the President had been accepted and that he thereafter abandoned it. The truth is that it is before the Judiciary Committee; and I very much hope that as soon as the subcommittee can find an opportunity to do it we will take up that subject and dispose of it. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that there is nothing so imperative at this moment as to reach a conclusion with regard to the things we ought to do after the war.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the interruption of the Senator from Iowa, and I am very glad to be corrected in any error I have made in stating the reasons for inactivity in a reconstruction program; but I am only assuming that the things I have thought to have been done are soon to be done, whenever the committee does meet. I know nothing practical has been done.

Mr. President, I realize that the Senate is weary, and I am disposed to apologize. I have been saying these things because I can not vote for the pending measure as an offering of American charity, if we are going to do it with the limitations and conditions proposed by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and also by our distinguished floor leader on this side of the Chamber [Mr. LODGE]. I do not want any string to the generosity of the Republic if I am going to vote $100,000,000 as a mark of generosity or charity; and, on the other hand, if this measure is presented in fulfillment of an agreement between Great Britain and France and the United States of America, I am ready to vote without a moment's hesitation if we have that mark of agreement or indication of agreement in the pending measure. But I do not want to be put in the attitude of voting away $100,000,000 of American money at the mere behest of the President, no matter how lofty his motives may be. I do not want to seem to be in the attitude of nagging or criticizing him. No one wishes him greater achievement in Europe in this most extraordinary visit than I do. I would be sorry, partisan that I am, if the President should come home in a state of humiliation. Perhaps it would not be serious if none were greater than his disappointment over peace point No. 1. That is example of the trouble with the idealist. He proclaims something splendid without thinking of the practical side. I knew that you could not have perfectly open negotiation, and you know you can not. The pity was that we committed ourselves to it unalterably before we learned the practical side of the situation.

I should like to vote for a measure which has the judgment and the conscience of the Senate back of it; but if we are going to do this, let us eliminate from the bill the restrictions tying the hands of the committee or the commission on the one hand or limiting the bounds of our generosity on the other. Maybe I have not enough of hate in my heart. Sometimes I think I am lacking in one of the essential attributes of a real human being because I can not hate; but if I am going to give of my bounty to the starving of the world I know neither nationality, creed, nor previous commitment to this very hour. I want it to be as broad as the humanity and justice for which this Republic stands.

One word more, Mr. President. I give notice now that if I give my sanction to the pending measures, which I doubt if I can, it is the last that I am going to give in the name of war or war necessity or war exigencies at Executive behest, because the war is ended and peace ought to be negotiated now. I refuse from this day on to be called upon to vote for any measure for the promotion of American success in the world war, because the triumph is recorded. I want a little more attention to the preservation of things at home. Senators, those of you who are good enough to listen to me, know that this Republic is founded on civil liberty, written for the first time in the history of the world into the American Constitution. On civil liberty you built the temples, religious liberty and human liberty, and the tendency of the hour is to strike at civil liberty and its guaranties. If this Republic is not committed in good conscience to the preservation of civil liberty and the maintenance of orderly government, our civilization has failed, and I warn you this war has been fought in vain to destroy autocracy and the menace of power such as Germany exercised before the war began. And the measureless sacrifice has been in vain, because the whole fabric of civilization will be torn asunder and humanity will have gone back five centuries instead of marching ahead, as it ought, with the soul of liberty aflame.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech; but in view of the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] that he did not intend to vote for any measure in future as a war-emergency matter, I am going to call his attention to a telegram received by me from Oregon this morning, and he may later be placed in a position where application will be made for appropriations that are distinctly war-emergency matters.

I have received the telegram which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and after its reading I desire to make a very brief statement about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., January 19, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

The situation of many of the discharged soldiers reaching this State is so unfortunate and the lack of employment is so serious that the legislature on Thursday passed an emergency measure creating a commission for the relief of discharged soldiers and sailors and appropriating $100,000 for this purpose. At the request of the legislature the highway commission will immediately arrange to put 1,000 men to work on force account, giving preference to the returned Oregon soldiers and sailors. The feeling of the people of this State is very pronounced that it is the duty of Congress to enact legislation that will make full and adequate provision for our discharged soldiers and sailors covering the period of time that will enable them to secure positions and resume their usual occupations, and I can not too strongly urge upon you the wisdom of exerting your great influence to secure the passage of such legislation.

W. B. AYER,
Chairman Soldiers and Sailors Commission.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That telegram is signed by one of our best and most disinterested citizens. He represented the Food Administration in Oregon during the whole period of the administration of the food law.

There is a condition, Mr. President, that has been brought about largely by this war emergency. There were at least 30,000 men who were engaged in spruce production under the direction of the War Department, and when the armistice was signed that whole production ceased, with the result that 30,000 men were immediately turned loose, to be absorbed by a small community. On the heels of that the Emergency Fleet Corporation canceled the contracts in Oregon and Washington for nearly 50 wooden ships, which turned loose on the community another 10,000 men engaged in ship construction, and, in addition to that, innumerable laborers in lumber yards of the Northwest.

Mr. President, the result of this governmental action, and I have no criticism to make of it particularly, is that the young men who are going back to those States must inevitably suffer. They are suffering, and not only the young soldiers but the laboring people of our community. All efforts to secure relief from the Shipping Board——

Mr. HARDING. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon if it would not relieve the situation, as far as the shipyards are concerned, if the Shipping Board would take off the ban and permit the shipyards to build by private contract.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think probably that is true; I understand they are not even building for foreign account. But the point I desire to make is that the Oregon Legislature has appropriated $100,000, not as a charity, but for the purpose of finding employment for these young men in highway construction. We have got to do something of that kind, because Oregon is not the only State affected. It will reach down into every State in this Union, and you will have applications to the legislatures to pass appropriation bills and to Congress to assist in their relief. They do not ask this as a charity.

I have introduced in the Senate of the United States, and there is now pending before the proper committee, a highway construction measure. These young men have been living out of doors for the past year or more, and there is no better way to improve the country and the condition of these young men than to have the Government itself engage in the construction of interstate roads.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to suggest to him that the emergency which he has just been discussing might be met if Congress would provide additional pay to the soldiers for six months? That would enable them to find work without having the States make appropriations for new roads for that purpose. That would be an inexpensive and easy settlement of a difficult problem, it seems to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. These young men do not ask charity. They want work. That is what they are asking in Oregon, and that is what the legislature proposes to give them. I think many of the men who are returning now would resent the giving to them of anything in the way of charity. They want work in Oregon, and they will want it in other States of the Union.

I put that telegram in the RECORD in order that Congress may begin to realize the situation that has already begun in the Northwest, one of the most prosperous sections of the United States.

GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK, ARIZ.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 390) to establish the Grand Canyon National Park in the State of Arizona, which were, on page 2, line 4, after "road," to insert ", passing and in relation to United States Geological Survey bench marks stamped 'Canyon' and numbered 6340, 6235, 6372, 6412, 6302, 6144, and 6129"; on page 2, line 12, after "Canyon," to insert ", crossing Hualapai Canyon and continuing northwesterly along said upper rim"; on page 5, line 4, to strike out "3, 4, 9, and 10" and insert "2, 3, 10, and 11"; on page 7, to strike out lines 14 to 18, inclusive, and insert:

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect the rights of the Havasupai Tribe of Indians to the use and occupancy of the bottom lands of the Canyon of Cataract Creek as described in the Executive order of March 31, 1882, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to permit individual members of said tribe to use and occupy other tracts of land within said park for agricultural purposes.

On page 8, line 14, after "Park," to insert "the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and upon such conditions as he may deem proper, grant easements or rights of way for railroads upon or across the park"; and on page 9, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 9. The Executive order of January 11, 1908, creating the Grand Canyon National Monument, is hereby revoked and repealed, and such parts of the Grand Canyon National Game Preserve, designated under authority of the act of Congress, approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act for the protection of wild animals in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve," as are by this act included with the Grand Canyon National Park are hereby excluded and eliminated from said game preserve.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to state that on Thursday at the conclusion of morning business I shall seek an opportunity to address the Senate on the American Expeditionary Force.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to present from the Committee on Privileges and Elections a favorable report upon Senate resolution 415 and to ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I object to the report. It is out of order. It is morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. POMERENE. Permit me to observe that I can readily distinguish courtesy from discourtesy. I find that one matter is presented and no objection is made, and then an objection is made to another report on the ground that it interferes with the custom of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I made objection to this report because I think it is improperly made, to begin with, and it is a very different character of report. There is no question of courtesy or discourtesy about it.

Mr. KNOX. I may say that an additional reason why the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts should have been made in this case is that this report comes from a meeting of the committee held this afternoon against the protest of some of the members of the committee and against the rules of the Senate which prohibit the holding of a meeting of a committee during the sessions of the Senate and against the objection of members.

Mr. POMERENE. Permit me to say that at this session of the committee there were 11 present out of the 15 members of the committee. Objection was made by two members of the committee on technical grounds that I shall discuss at the proper time.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 22, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 21, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Oh, Thou Infinite Spirit, above all, through all, and in us all, a potent influence, the inspiration of all that is truly noble, give to all, especially those who hold influential positions in our Government, great thought and impel them to great acts, that the genius of our Republic may more and more obtain, till truth and right, justice and liberty shall reign supreme and brotherly love prevail everywhere. In the name and spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEARL RIVER, MISS.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11948, for the purpose of concurring in a Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill with the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 11948) granting the consent of Congress to the Great Southern Lumber Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, doing business in the State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across Pearl River at or near the north line of section 22, township 8 north, range 21 west, west of the basis meridian, in the land district east of Pearl River, in the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the word "and."

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11984) to provide for the Fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the request of the Senate for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am interested in having consideration by the House of Senate amendment No. 12, which provides—

That after the passage of this act preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive departments and in independent governmental establishments.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Tennessee say about that?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing that the House shall have a separate vote upon that amendment if it is not agreed to in conference.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Will the gentleman consent to exclude that in his motion to disagree?

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no. I think it is sufficient to let it be the understanding of the House that we shall have a separate vote upon that if it becomes necessary.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I would like to have it considered at this time, so that a motion can be made to concur in that amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman mean at this time?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. At this time.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better get this bill into conference. I think we will have no trouble about this amendment, and I do not think we ought to act on different propositions, which will cause unnecessary delay.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. If the gentleman will assure the House that this will be brought back and that the House will have an opportunity to vote on it unless the conferees agree to the amendment, that will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall do that, as far as it is in my power; and I take it that will be the understanding of the House.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman make the same agreement as to amendments 13 and 14?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as to amendment numbered 26 and other kindred amendments that seek to provide for a quinquennial census rather than a decennial census, I think, in view of the tremendous expense occasioned by taking the censuses, the House should be given the opportunity to vote upon the question of taking a quinquennial census rather than a decennial census before that is agreed to. I question whether the House wishes to agree to that, because it is such an important matter, involving a burden of $15,000,000 on the Treasury. I think the House conferees will realize that such an important matter should be brought back to the House before it is agreed to, so that the House may have a chance to vote upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I fully agree with the gentleman as to the importance and magnitude of that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think on such an important matter the House should be given an opportunity to express itself before the amendment is agreed to in conference. We have never expressed ourselves heretofore in favor of taking a quinquennial census.

Mr. ASWELL. If the gentleman insists on the conferees making promises in advance as to every item, it will leave them in a very embarrassing position when they go into conference. We have already agreed to submit two or three matters to the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. This quinquennial census would impose a burden of $15,000,000 upon the Treasury. It is a proposition of such magnitude that I think it is only a fair request that it be submitted to the House. Of course these little minor matters as to the civil service, and so forth——

Mr. ASWELL. I do not think the gentleman need fear about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to bind the conferees, but to have it understood that the House will have an opportunity to express itself before it is agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does any other gentleman want to save out anything?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have others in my system, but will reserve them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON]?

There was no objection, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. ASWELL, and Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] is chairman of the committee and has been on the conference committee, but he is at home sick.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am glad to state that I telegraphed to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] on two different days, and the answer to my second telegram was that it was impossible for him to be in attendance, and requesting me to go ahead as the ranking member and take charge of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 12881. An act to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans.

The message also announced that the Vice President, under the requirements of the act of August 29, 1916, had appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. KING, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. HALE, members of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to visit the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13366. An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11948. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Great Southern Lumber Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, doing business in the State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across Pearl River, at or near the north line of section 22, township 8 north, range 21 west, west of the basis meridian, in the land district east of Pearl River, in the State of Mississippi.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 198. Joint resolution to suspend the doing of assessment work on mining claims in Alaska for the years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, and extending to that Territory the provisions of public resolution No. 10, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved July 17, 1917, and public resolution No. 12, Sixty-fifth Congress, approved October 5, 1917, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

R. T. COOK.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 498.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to R. T. Cook the sum of $500 for extra services rendered in the folding room of the House during the Sixty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Oklahoma ought to give us some explanation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Cook is employed as a folder in the folding room, and, as the report indicates, is paid $85 a month. Some few years ago there were three assistant foremen, but the number was reduced to one. Mr. Cook is now doing the work, and has been doing the work of a foreman. Since the number was reduced an amount of $500 has been allowed each Congress, and this is the same resolution which was passed at the last Congress. He is doing this extra work, and has been doing the extra work, and for that extra work the Committee on Accounts has recommended this amount.

Mr. MANN. Is this for the entire Congress?

Mr. HASTINGS. This is for the entire Congress, $250 for each session. This folder gets $85, and of course this would be $250 a session added.

Mr. MANN. This is another instance of Democratic economy.

Mr. GARNER. We are following the Republican example.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. This resolution has been passed several times.

Mr. MANN. But always by a Democratic House.

Mr. GARNER. On the motion of a Republican Member of Congress.

Mr. MANN. I do not know about that; a Republican is not making the motion here.

Mr. HASTINGS. This is the unanimous report from the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

SEBE NEWMAN.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 459.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $600 to Sebe Newman for extra services rendered in connection with the sending out of blanks, receiving, filing, and compiling expense statements filed by candidates for Representatives in Congress, in accordance with H. R. 2958 of the Sixty-second Congress, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected, and extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States and limiting the amount of campaign expenses.'"

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of this resolution I will say that a similar resolution was passed since the passage of the act referred to in the resolution six or eight years ago. This is for extra services rendered by Mr. Newman in the Clerk's office. This is for services rendered out of office hours. A similar resolution has been passed each year since this act of Congress was passed which is referred to in the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the services are rendered out of office hours. These are services which the Clerk is compelled to perform. They are not supposed to be rendered out of office hours. The Clerk is required to perform the services.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me interrupt the gentleman by saying that the book in which the accounts are kept has to be in the Clerk's office and open for inspection, and I understand that the insertion of these data has to be done at night and out of office hours, because the book has to be kept there for inspection during office hours. That is the explanation made to the committee.

Mr. MANN. The book is kept there like other books are kept for inspection which relate to the filing of statements and work in connection with it. Of course there ought to be provision made by the House for the work. Whether it ought to be in the form of extra compensation for somebody in the Clerk's office I will not undertake to say. It certainly ought to be provided for by the House. The Clerk ought to be given help enough to do the work. These resolutions for extra help year after year, for matters the House requires to be done, is not a very satisfactory method; the Clerk ought to be provided with sufficient help, and was provided with sufficient help until our Democratic friends got control, and now they do it by giving bonuses.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to inquire what clerk has the duty of having charge of these statements and exhibiting them to the public when the public wants to see them?

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand that this man Newman, whose name is mentioned in the resolution, has charge of the book which is kept in the Clerk's office.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say that I have been there several times to see statements and never found any particular clerk in charge. In fact, they are very loosely kept, and it is mighty hard to get the information you want by looking at the statements. I have found at times that the entries were not made promply in the book. I think we ought to make it somebody's duty to do it and to pay him for it. I am not satisfied with the method in which that is done down there at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD two short columns of very laudatory matter passed by the Albany Chamber of Commerce at Albany, N. Y., relating to Theodore Roosevelt. It was passed at the last meeting and published in the Albany (N. Y.) Times-Union January 10, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. DENISON. What part of the late President Roosevelt's career is it laudatory of?

Mr. FERRIS. It deals with his entire life and characteristics, and lauds him as being a combination of youth and age, that he never grew old, and so forth, and as a hero.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman wish to send this out as a public document?

Mr. FERRIS. No; but I assume gentlemen on the other side will want to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is very accommodating, and we shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The publication above referred to is as follows:

[From the Albany (N. Y.) Times-Union, Jan. 10, 1919.]

A MEMORIAL OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF ALBANY, N. Y.

(The following memorial, written by former Gov. Martin H. Glynn, was unanimously adopted by the Albany Chamber of Commerce at its meeting last night, and an engrossed copy ordered sent to Mrs. Roosevelt:)

In the death of Theodore Roosevelt the people of Albany mourn the loss of a neighbor and a friend.

The Nation grieves for a statesman, the world for a great dynamic force, but we lament the man. Our grief, though, finds solace in the faith that our sorrow will change into song as time brings to the fame of Theodore Roosevelt the regal coronation it so richly deserves. Here in Albany he served in the halls of legislation, here he lived in the executive mansion, and from here he went on his way to the Presidency, and so we feel that while New York gave him to the Nation, Albany gave him to the world.

As old friends and neighbors we love to bask in the reflected glory of his world-belting honors; but now that taps have sounded, the lights are out, and the leader leads no more; now that the drums are muffled and the flags flutter at half staff, we, of course, exult in his deeds that filled the eye of the world and in his words that fired the hearts of men, but above this exultation, we, his old friends and neighbors, voice our pride in the fact that Theodore Roosevelt died the most distinguished private citizen in the world.

Chance, circumstance, and a kaleidoscopic combination of events may bring a man power and place, but only a great heart, a great head, and a kindly hand can keep a man as great in private life as he ever was in the panoply of power. In all history Theodore Roosevelt is one of the few men whose power did not depend on place. The source of his power was locked within his own breast and made him the most influential man of his time, the most picturesque American since Benjamin Franklin and Abraham Lincoln. In office or out of office he was great because he had in him the stuff which has made men live in the pages of Plutarch for 2,000 years; in office or out of office he was great because he had in him the stuff which Thomas Carlyle says makes hero worshipers out of mankind, in him the stuff Ralph Waldo Emerson finds so commendable in "Representative Men."

Impulsive, brisk, full of intensive vitality, direct and to the point in his consideration of any subject matter, aggressive to a marked degree, ever ready to accept the challenge and fight to the last ditch, convincingly eloquent of speech and entertainingly commanding with the pen, ever doing the unexpected, battering down precedent and brushing aside the conventional, intensely loyal to his friends and unrelenting with his foes, born leader of men, an ardent advocate but a just judge, foremost in the field or on the platform or in the exercise of executive functions, turning from one activity to another with the greatest of dexterity, yet performing each duty thoroughly and satisfactorily—Theodore Roosevelt was one of the most marvelous men, not only of this age but of all time.

His character is his monument and "a square deal" the epitome of his life. He never allowed age to rob him of his youth, and from this sprang his exuberance of spirit whose contagiousness gave him the largest personal following in America. In play time he played, in work time he worked, and in fight time he fought, and fought like a lion. He dealt hard blows, but never dealt a foul one. He made no pretense of being a superman; he was content to be an ordinary, every-day man, with the ordinary man's virtues and the ordinary man's faults. And therein lay his greatness, for he possessed the common traits of the common man to a highly uncommon degree. All his life long, in public life and in private life, he fought "short weights" and "false measures." And to his credit be it said that after 30 years of immunity he compelled interests that had been shortweighting and false-measuring the public to burn their bushels and hide the ashes.

In the sum total of life it is not the isolated deed that counts; it's the grand average, and Theodore Roosevelt's average was handsomely high. He was as versatile as the seasons, as spontaneous as the breeze. From tracing the lineage of a fossil in the rocks to hunting the tiger in his native lair, from the silence and seclusion of the study to the rush of the field and the tumult of the forum, Theodore Roosevelt scored the highest average of any man in public life the whole wide world around. His mental acquisitiveness was insatiable, but avarice for knowledge was his only cupidity. He fled the valley land of the specialist; he sought the mountain top of the generalist; he followed Samuel Johnson's advice "to survey mankind with extensive view from China to Peru," and, though little given to imitation, he imitated Lord Bacon and took "all knowledge for his province." His courage, robust and unbreakable, fed on opposition and grew on strife. Out of difficulties, vexations, and defeats he made stepping stones to higher things. The world loved him for his virtues, and so do we, but we also love him for his faults.

Faults; yes, his heart throbbed warm with pulses human,
But carping envy's self might scarce deplore
The faults that doubly vouched him staunch and true man,
And only made men love him all the more.

Motes in the sunshine, foam on the billows,
Cloud shadows floating o'er the mountain crest,
His faults but marked the mighty play, the motion
Of a grand nature in its grand unrest.

The world has lost a great man, America one of the most illustrious of her sons, and mankind a most ardent benefactor. From the furthermost ends of the earth come messages of regret, sympathy, and condolence. Universal is the recognition of his greatness, universal the grief at his passing. The gleam has gone from his eye, the eloquence of his voice is hushed, the throb of his impulsive but generous heart is stilled, and he lies cold in death. He has entered upon eternal sleep within the quiet precincts of the cemetery at Oyster Bay, and the great problems of life will never more rouse him from his "lowly bed." But he leaves behind him a life memory in which is clustered the work of the mighty. His is "one of the few, the immortal names that were not born to die."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KITCHEN, at the request of Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, for to-day, on account of sickness.

BUSINESS IN ORDER ON CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has advised me that it is exceedingly important to finish the consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill to-morrow, and he has requested me to ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday, to-morrow, be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what time will the House adjourn to-day?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, we have had requests on this side for a good deal of time in general debate, probably five hours.

Mr. MANN. Is it intended to hold an evening session? I do not think that the House ought to meet at 11 o'clock in the morning if we are to be kept here late.

Mr. FLOOD. No; I thought we would get through by 6 or 7 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. There is a Republican conference called for to-night, and we would like to have the House adjourn in time, so that Republicans may have opportunity to go home to their dinners and be back here at 8 o'clock.

Mr. FLOOD. What time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. Half past 5 or 6 o'clock.

Mr. GARNER. Say not later than 6 o'clock.

Mr. FLOOD. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the understanding that we are to consider the bill other than in general debate to-day?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; if we get through with the general debate. General debate may not take up all of the time. Let us run on until 6 o'clock, and then we will rise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow?

There was no objection.

PURCHASE OF EMBASSY AND LEGATION BUILDINGS ABROAD.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 504.

Resolved, That after the adoption of this resolution and when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 14516, a bill making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, it shall be in order (the general rules of the House notwithstanding) to consider the following item in said bill:

Lines 16 to 24, inclusive, on page 25, and lines 1 to 5, inclusive, on page 26, reading as follows:

"For the purchase or erection, and the alteration, repair, and furnishing of embassy and legation buildings in the principal capitals of the world, and consular buildings at the principal ports in China, $3,000,000; and the Secretary of State is hereby given authority to acquire, for the purpose specified, as soon as may advantageously be done, suitable buildings, and to alter, repair, and furnish said buildings or acquire appropriate sites, and to erect and furnish suitable buildings thereon, or to acquire options upon suitable buildings or appropriate sites, as may, in his judgment, be for the best interests of the Government: Provided, however, That not more than $250,000 shall be expended at any one place, except that in cities containing 1,000,000 or more inhabitants the limit of cost shall be $500,000."

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] if he desires any time on this rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman move the previous question and we then will have 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Kansas opposed to this resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have some hesitation as to its wisdom.

Mr. FOSTER. Some of us who are on the Committee on Rules are opposed to the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the gentleman and I will not disagree.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman is opposed to the resolution, I think he ought to have control of the time, but if he is in favor of the resolution I do not think he ought to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I shall yield time to anyone who desires it in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman is opposed to the resolution, of course he is entitled to time; but unless he is opposed to it I do not think he has any right to control the time in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. MANN. That question does not arise now.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course it does not, but it is just as well to understand it now as later.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, before we begin let us have an understanding in respect to who shall control the time upon the resolution in opposition to it. I do not want to be contentious about it, if the gentleman from Kansas really wants to control the time.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Kansas in favor of the resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I stated my position on this to the Committee on Rules, just as I shall state it here. I do not think we ought to take up matters of this kind at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am.

The SPEAKER. That settles the matter.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for making in order the last provision of the Consular and Diplomatic appropriation bill, touching the appropriation of $3,000,000 to construct embassies and consulates in capital cities throughout the world. It occurred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs that if there was ever a time when liberal appropriations should be made to build residences for our diplomats abroad it is now.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What was it that made it so strike the committee?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. If the gentleman will hold his soul in patience, I shall try to enlighten him. In Washington, for instance, Great Britain pays her ambassador $50,000 a year and provides a magnificent residence for him, as well as an expense account. The little country of Cuba pays its ambassador $21,600 a year and provides a suitable residence for him. France allows its representative here $35,000 and full rental and expense allowance. Italy pays its ambassador here $25,000 a year and provides $12,000 a year for rental of a residence and expense allowance. Every ambassador and minister to this country from every country throughout the world allows either its representatives a rental and expense account or residence in which they may live.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. Admitting, of course, that is true, but what I wanted to know particularly was why it struck the committee at this particular time that we ought to do this?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. For the reason that at this particular time if American diplomacy has ever stood high among the people of the world it stands high to-day, and if we want to retain that high standard among the peoples of the world it is now. Only rich men can now hold these positions. I want to make it possible to see men of ability, irrespective of their wealth, hold these positions. In 1911 the Congress passed what was known as the Lowden Act, by providing that Congress might appropriate each year not over $500,000 to build at least three embassies or legations, but in no instance should any legation cost over $150,000. Under that act we have appropriated, I think, for three places, and only three legations have been constructed under it. We found this situation to exist, that in Paris, for instance, Great Britain has an embassy that is worth approximately $1,500,000; Germany an embassy that is worth approximately $700,000 or more; Italy, something over $400,000; Austria-Hungary, perhaps $1,000,000; and I am sure that no American Representative who desires to see his country's representatives in foreign capitals stand as high as the representatives of other countries would want to erect a residence in Paris that would cost no more than $150,000, and it is to carry on this high standard that our diplomats representing the United States have taken, that we want to build these residences in capitals abroad. Surely, if we are to cope in the rivalry of trade and commerce with foreign nations, we want capable representatives throughout the world. Let us go after trade everywhere. Let us impress on the world the greatness of our country.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman is correct in his statement that the diplomacy of the United States has never stood higher than now, and it has reached that point without these buildings and without these enormous expenses. Is there any reason to believe it may lose caste in case we do not saddle upon the taxpayer this additional burden at this time when we have already placed upon them an indebtedness that your children and my children, and perhaps their grandchildren, will not see wiped out? Does the gentleman think this is the time to add this additional expense to the burdens they already bear?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. If there was ever an opportune time to build these embassies, it is now if we want to continue to hold the trade of the world that we have gained. We are appropriating large sums of money to send commercial attachés and commercial agents throughout the world to obtain trade. We have spent billions in constructing ships to carry that commerce after we have obtained it. The $3,000,000 provided for in this provision is about a sixth of what a battleship will cost, and battleships last only 8 or 10 years, and then they are thrown into the scrap heap, while these embassies will continue to grow in value.

Mr. HAMLIN. The building of these residences will not do away with a single battleship——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That is very true.

Mr. HAMLIN. And I can not understand how the building of an embassy building in which our minister may live will increase the foreign trade. I think we had better expend that money in employing other agencies to visit these countries and work up that trade.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman knows there are over 99 per cent of the people in foreign capitals who never visit the United States, but they form their opinion in a less or greater degree by the way our ambassadors and our ministers conduct themselves abroad. I submit that now is a very opportune time to build these embassies and hold the high place our diplomacy has now gained.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The item in the bill which it is proposed to make in order, of course, the gentleman is familiar with, because he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That appropriates $3,000,000, and, as I understand it, puts no limit of cost at all as to the amount that may be required to be appropriated hereafter except the $250,000 or $500,000 at a place.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That is true.

Mr. MANN. It authorizes the Secretary of State to incur such expenses as he may desire or such obligations as he may desire, to be paid for hereafter.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That is true.

Mr. MANN. It entirely removes that limitation of the so-called Lowden Act?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I think it does. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have two objections to the resolution. The first is that we are approaching the 4th of March and the business of the session has hardly been commenced. We have scarcely commenced even with the supply bills. The great burden of the work is yet before us. This resolution will make in order a matter that will provoke discussion that will delay this bill at least a day, in my judgment. We must adjourn on the 4th of March whether the supply bills have been passed or not. Making matters of this kind in order on supply bills is going to make it impossible for the majority of the House to complete the work of this Congress before the 4th day of March. Now, if it is the purpose of those responsible for supplying the Government with the necessary means to keep it alive for the next fiscal, before the 4th day of March they must adopt a different program and not saddle upon appropriation bills legislation and matters of this kind that will provoke discussion.

The appropriation bills from this on must be stripped of everything in the nature of legislation, in the nature of new matter that will provoke discussion, if it is the purpose of the majority to pass the appropriation bills before the adjournment. It is a matter of policy—of expediting the business of the Congress—with a view of avoiding a special session of Congress if it is the intention of the majority to avoid a special session.

Upon the other hand, I doubt very seriously, however desirable it may be to have embassies, splendid buildings, in the capitals of the world, that this is a time to add that additional burden to the burden now carried by our people. The people of this country have been burdened within the past two years to the amount of over $30,000,000,000 that they must pay interest upon. They must provide for paying the principal. And if you ask a few millions here and a few millions there and keep adding other millions upon all these appropriation bills for every matter that looks feasible, upon every matter that looks as though it really ought to be done, upon every matter that looks as though it would promote our interests in this direction or in that, we will continue to pile up millions until they reach hundreds of millions and to billions of dollars. We must call a halt somewhere. We have proceeded in the past to fairly get our case before the world in foreign countries, and if there have been faults or shortcomings they have not been due to the fact that we have not had suitable buildings. If our diplomacy has been wanting it has been because we have no foreign policy that has been continuous, that has proceeded one year after another upon a given line, but has changed with the whim of the administration from one policy to another and has changed ambassadors and ministers because of political affiliations.

Men who have had no diplomatic training at all have often been sent to represent us because they have had money, and one administration after another has thought that because they contributed to campaigns these men should be rewarded by giving them positions as ambassadors and ministers. And that has been true not through this administration alone but through all administrations. So I say whatever of shortcoming attaches to our diplomacy is not because of the condition of our embassies, but because of our want of a policy, of a foreign office with a foreign policy that continues from one year to another without regard to change of political administration in the country.

Our finances are being burdened, I repeat, far beyond anything that has ever been looked forward to by the American people. We have been cautious about making large appropriations for these embassies in years when our expenditures were within a billion of dollars. Next year our expenditures, it is said, will run beyond $11,000,000,000, and yet it is proposed here to add three more millions of dollars. We shall make in order a bill within a few days, which should have been done long ago, appropriating $10,000 000 for necessary hospitals for our wounded and disabled soldiers now returning from the war. Some things must be done. But this is one of the things that can be postponed. It is for these two reasons that I think this is an inopportune time to make this item in order on this appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used eight minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twelve minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Have I eight minutes remaining, or did I use eight?

The SPEAKER. There are 12 minutes remaining on each side.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-eight Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. FLOOD and Mr. FOSTER moved a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 269 Members—a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I will, provided it does not come out of my time.

TITLE TO A LOT AT EUREKA, UTAH.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] stated he would yield to me for the purpose of trying to get a little bill through, of immediate importance.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I wanted to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3384. I want to state that it is a bill which has passed the Senate, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept title to a lot at Eureka, Utah, waiving the mineral rights. I want to say that the urgency of it comes about by reason of the fact that a case is now pending in the court out there to condemn the lot. The matter has been held up. The case has been postponed, and the court has been awaiting the action of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman asking unanimous consent?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes. I wanted to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the gentleman must get the time to make a statement.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am asking unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill. I want to state the urgency of it. Mr. Speaker, if the condemnation proceedings proceed it will cost the Government about $120,000 to get that lot.

Mr. MANN. Why was not the gentleman here when the House opened to-day to make that request?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to state to the gentleman that I was sick last night, and took a pretty thorough course of medicine, and was delayed this morning—if the gentleman wants to know. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I shall have to object.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It will take only two minutes.

PURCHASE OF EMBASSY AND LEGATION BUILDINGS ABROAD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 12 minutes, and he yields two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this rule ought, I think, to be adopted. The subject involved is of exceptional importance. The State Department is very insistent, and, in my judgment, rightly so, that these proposed appropriations are absolutely necessary in the interest of our vastly important foreign service. But the question of whether we shall or shall not make the appropriations is not now before us. If we adopt this resolution, we simply say that Members shall have an opportunity to hear the arguments for and against making the appropriations. If after hearing the arguments on both sides the House should decide to reject the proposition, very well. But it ought not, before making a decision, to refuse itself the opportunity to know the facts. Such an opportunity this rule, if adopted, will afford the House. It can do nothing more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield for a short question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I regret that my time is too short to yield for a question.

Mr. Speaker, the consuls of the United States are business agents for the American people. They ought to be properly housed, but it is well known—it is notorious—that in many important places they are very inadequately housed. American consuls will tell you that every day they lose business in competition with the agents of other Governments because they themselves are housed as if they were not there to do business. Everyone who was in the House when we appropriated to purchase the site for our consulate on the water front in Shanghai remembers how it was denounced as extravagant. And yet experience has already demonstrated, and will in the future more and more demonstrate, that that purchase was an investment which pays dividends. It was a wise appropriation. It has given our consuls—our Government's business agents—in the great port of Shanghai, the London of the Orient, greatly needed facilities to compete for business in the rich market of China with their rivals from other countries.

The rule should be adopted and the proposed appropriation be fairly discussed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it might be well in passing to say the appropriation involved here does not cover consulate buildings anywhere in the world, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], except in China. There is a proposition in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill to appropriate $3,000,000 for the purchase or acquirement of embassy and legation buildings to be owned by the United States throughout the world, with no limit of cost whatever on the amount which may be obligated by the Secretary of State. He is not limited by the amount of $3,000,000, but can purchase buildings to any extent that he pleases all over the world, with the one limit not to exceed $500,000 in a city of a million inhabitants and $250,000 elsewhere.

But this is what I want to call to the attention of the House: We have been seven weeks in session. There are just six weeks more of this session, almost to the minute. There are 14 general appropriation bills which must be passed or left over for an extra session. There have been six of these appropriation bills reported to the House and but four passed.

Now, I do not know whether the President has directed the Democratic side of the House to force an extra session of Congress or not; but it looks as though he had. Here you are bringing in controversial propositions all the time. In addition to the appropriation bills we have an unusual bill, a census bill, yet to be disposed of, and the revenue bill yet to be disposed of, and a bill providing money for the purchase of wheat at the price guaranteed by the Government yet to be disposed of, and a number of other unusual bills yet to be disposed of. The Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill ought to be passed in a day's time, and probably would be but for this rule and this item in the bill. If this rule does not prevail this item in the bill will go out on a point of order.

Unless our Democratic friends are going to force an extra session of Congress, the Committee on Rules should stop bringing in rules to make in order controversial matters on appropriation bills at this session of Congress. It has been the practice of Congress for many years that the controversial items on appropriation bills in the main shall come in at the long session of Congress, when they can be considered with ample time. To bring them in at the short session of Congress is contrary to the practice and ought not to be indulged in. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I heartily favor the adoption of this rule. I am sorry that it should be a matter of controversy, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. To me a measure of this sort seems absolutely necessary if this Nation is to take its proper place in the councils of the nations of the world. This is the wise thing to do, gentlemen. It is the democratic thing to do. Unfortunately, this Nation, among all the nations of the world, has singled out its Diplomatic Service and made it peculiarly a service in which nobody except the very rich could engage. This is absolutely true in the case of ambassadors. No American citizen, no matter how great his ability, no matter how great his experience, can afford to be an ambassador of the United States unless he be a very rich man. Some years ago Congress put in the entering wedge by authorizing the erection of embassies and of legations and of consulates; but, unfortunately, in the case of the large cities of the world the limit put on by Congress is too small. It is utterly impossible to acquire the land and buildings suitable for an American embassy for the limit of cost now imposed in our legislation. The result of the passage of this bill will be to enable us to acquire dignified residences for our representatives in the great European capitals and will go a long way—will go most of the way—toward relieving the undemocratic situation where these great posts are solely within the reach of men of great wealth. I say that is un-American and undemocratic, and this proposition will do much to relieve the situation. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of those who came in after the proposition was first presented, it may be proper to say that the matter before the House is a resolution reported from the Committee on Rules to make in order a provision contained in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill as reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which otherwise would not be in order, that appropriates outright $3,000,000 and authorizes expenditures unlimited in character except as to the price of the properties that may be purchased for the construction of homes for ambassadors and ministers of this country in foreign countries. Now, I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the merits of the proposition itself. It is no new question in this House. It has agitated the House ever since I have been a Member of it, and at various times has been presented, and once or twice at least has been passed upon; but, so far as I recall, it has always been presented and passed upon as an independent proposition. It has not been contained in an appropriation bill.

Let me say, furthermore, that the division upon the question has never been along party lines, and the division at this time in the Committee on Rules was not along party lines. My opposition to making this in order at this time upon this bill is based on the principle that we ought to stop loading down the appropriation bills with riders at this session of Congress [applause] in order that we may pass those vital appropriations that are necessary to enable the Government to live. Surely we do not wish to place ourselves in a position where, by reason of the failure of an appropriation bill, a special session of Congress may be necessary. A special session of Congress may be necessary. I am not prepared to say about that; but I am prepared to say that, in my opinion, it will be a reflection upon the business capacity of the Congress if we fail to pass the appropriation bills and for that reason render a special session necessary. Because of that, and without entering upon a discussion of the merits of the proposition, I feel constrained to disagree with some of my colleagues on the Committee on Rules on this resolution.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I realize that we consume some time with this resolution and with the discussion of this proposition, but it is one which I feel is of vital interest to the country at this time. We are entering upon an age never before experienced in the history of the world. We are to take our part in the affairs of the entire world. We are to show those people of other countries whether we have entered into world affairs or whether we propose to continue isolated as we have been in the past. One of the ways to do that is to select men to be our representatives abroad because of brains and ability and not because of their wealth. We can not select men for their brains—unless they have great abundance of wealth—until you provide homes for them abroad or very largely increase their salaries. The committee has given this matter very serious consideration. It has been discussed for years, and there is no time better than the present to start if we propose to take our place in world affairs. I certainly hope that this committee will at least adopt this resolution, so that the matter may be in order on the appropriation bill and that we may discuss it before the House upon its merits. It will not take us very long to do it. It will not take as long to do it as it did the gentleman from Illinois to discuss that proposition the other day of $75,000 for conciliatory men in the Labor Department, where he charged that a number of Congressmen were employed, and it was found that there were only two——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do.

Mr. MANN. I never said a word on the subject.

Mr. LINTHICUM. You certainly spoke about it.

Mr. MANN. I did not.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And said it was a good place for Democrats who were not reelected—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1677.

Mr. MANN. I did not take the floor on it at all. You are just as far off on most things as you are on that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am right on that proposition, because I was right here and heard the discussion. I think we ought to take up this proposition at this time and decide it on its merits, and we can do that by adopting this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss].

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I am heartily in favor of this rule, which simply makes in order the question of whether or not we will purchase or build embassies abroad. It is not a new proposition in this House. The distinguished governor of my State when he was a Member of this House introduced a bill in favor of building embassies and consulates abroad. That bill passed Congress February 17, 1911, but a limitation was placed on it of $150,000 at any one place, and all this rule does is to make in order the modification of that limitation so far as it affects $3,000,000 appropriated in this bill.

It has been the policy, in accordance with this law, to build consulates abroad, and we have already built them abroad. This Government ought to establish embassies in foreign countries. It is a shame to our country that we only pay our ambassadors abroad—to London, Paris, and Rome—$17,500 a year. That salary was fixed when? March 3, 1875. Think of it! And yet what is the result? The result is, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, only millionaires or men of large means can afford to accept these positions. I think I have known most of the ambassadors of our country to these places during the last 20 years, and I have had private conversations with them. Nearly every one of them has stated to me that it has cost them double, sometimes three and four times as much as the salary which the Government pays them to maintain their establishments with the dignity commensurate with our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this rule, and I hope the House will vote it down. It seems to me that this is not the time to enter upon a great undertaking such as laid down in this bill, appropriating $3,000,000 to build embassies and consular buildings. This Government can well afford to wait until some of the most pressing needs of the Government are disposed of. We are now taxing the people to the limit. It occurs to me that to put $3,000,000 more on this bill than is absolutely necessary at this time is not treating the people fair whom we represent on the floor of this House. [Applause.]

This provision of the bill will also permit, as has been stated here, the Secretary of State to provide buildings, nobody knows to what limit of cost. I remember a few years ago when we passed the Lowden bill it was then stated that within a few years our foreign service would cost us $50,000,000 a year. We have not gotten to that amount yet, but we are branching out now upon a scheme that will sooner or later entail an enormous increase of expense. Not only will we have to build buildings at a great expense, but it will require vast sums of money to provide for the upkeep of all these buildings throughout the world. I believe we ought to wait until conditions are more normal at home and throughout the world.

I am sure that so far as the diplomacy of our country is concerned it is recognized to-day by all the people of the world as the very highest. Our country has taken a position which makes it unnecessary that we should spend $3,000,000 at this time to bring our country up to the dignity that some think it ought to occupy. Our country has that dignity now. [Applause.] We are not going to need great buildings to show to the world that we have the dignity and power this Government has earned.

I think this rule ought to be defeated now, and that this provision of the bill ought to be stricken out on a point of order when we get to it, so we can then go ahead with the regular appropriations that we are expected to make before the 4th of March. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, at this particular time when we are going out over the country begging the people to buy liberty bonds and insisting upon the people supporting the Government in the condition in which the Treasury finds itself, it seems to me it is the worst sort of business to ask the people at this particular moment in our history to embark on this method of taking care of our ministers abroad.

This bill will permit the Secretary of State to obligate the Government to an unlimited number of propositions. The appropriation now carries $3,000,000, which will all be spent. Let me appeal to this House; we have gone 135 years, and our dignity has not suffered abroad. Benjamin Franklin did not have to have a magnificent palace to cause him to be respected in Paris, nor did Thomas Jefferson, nor will any man of proper character need it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. No; I have only three minutes' time, and the gentleman knows it.

At this time we do not need to buy royalty abroad. In view of the fact that we are going out to beg the people to take $6,000,000,000 of liberty bonds to pay our debts—and notwithstanding that fact the committee brings this bill in here and asks you to make in order on this bill not simply an expenditure of $3,000,000, but the proposition to give the Secretary of State authority to contract for an unlimited number of buildings—let the matter be postponed until we pay our debts and know where we are going to get these billions of dollars. Let me appeal to you that if you were directing your own business, and you were deeply involved, as the United States Government is, not knowing whether the notes of the Government issue are going to be always received readily, not knowing whether this six billions is going to be sufficient, without any fault on the part of the Treasury, you would not favor an unnecessary increase in your indebtedness, and it looks as if gentlemen ought not to put this new proposition forward. Let us let it wait awhile, because when the Treasury is in better shape you may take these matters up and build these embassies, if the Congress so desires. Let us not make this in order at this time. We have begged the people to economize in order to buy liberty bonds in the past, and we will beg them to economize in the future in order that they may be in a position to buy these bonds, and this is no time to burden them with unnecessary expense. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will adopt this rule and give its membership an opportunity to vote on the proposition submitted in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill. If the House does not wish to enter into these expenditures, to which my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is so opposed, the House can vote the proposition down when that item is reached in the bill. But surely there can be no sound reason why the House should not be allowed to vote on this proposition.

I do not think there is any strength in the suggestion that we are wasting time and may cause an extraordinary session of Congress by the consideration of this important measure. It will not take long when it is reached.

This is an important measure, and the House should have an opportunity to pass upon it. The United States has emerged from the war with a new place among the nations, with a prestige of which she must in the future be very jealous, and a responsibility in international affairs to which she must be deeply sensitive.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] says that our diplomacy stands at the very top now. That, Mr. Speaker, is so, but it is so not because Congress has been liberal with our diplomats, but it is so because in spite of our lack of liberality we have secured a splendid corps of representatives through the patriotism of gentlemen who are willing to sacrifice their private fortunes in the interest of their country and because we have in the White House as the guide of our diplomatic corps the profoundest international mind and the most far-seeing diplomat of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We wish to maintain the high standard we have achieved by enabling the President and his successors in office to call on the best-fitted men for these positions, regardless of their wealth.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has long been an advocate of the policy which this appropriation carries out. The present governor of Illinois, Gov. Lowden, introduced in a Republican Congress and secured the enactment of a measure the policy of which this provision is carrying into effect. The trouble about the Lowden Act is that under the conditions we find to-day, because of the increased price of real estate all over the world, we can not buy an embassy or legation or a consulate anywhere, except in the unimportant capitals and consular cities of the world. We desire the limitations of that act taken off. That is all the appropriation does. It does not inaugurate a new policy. It simply enables Congress to comply with a policy it inaugurated years ago by taking off the limitations of the Lowden Act. It permits the purchase of embassies and legations at a price at which they can be secured in Europe and the purchase of consulates in China, where they must be obtained soon if we expect to get proper locations at all.

I trust the rule will be adopted. We have begun the fight to-day to democratize our foreign service, and we are going to keep it up until that object is accomplished. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, nays 173, answered "present" 5, not voting 147, as follows:

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14516, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, and pending that I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]——

Mr. STAFFORD. My colleague was here just a moment ago.

Mr. FLOOD. I had an understanding with the gentleman from Wisconsin as to the time for general debate.

Mr. MANN. What was the understanding?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was it the gentleman desired?

Mr. FLOOD. I was just asking if we could not agree on time for general debate.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from Virginia and I had an understanding that we would have four hours of general debate, to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that request?

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman that since I talked with him I had a conversation with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], a member of the committee, and he said he was going to ask the gentleman for 30 minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I promised him yesterday the 30 minutes, and that was included in the request for 2 hours.

Mr. FLOOD. I have requests for and have promised two and a half hours, and, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I ask that general debate be limited to four and a half hours——

Mr. MANN. Oh, make it even on both sides.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say that last year I gave the gentleman from Wisconsin about twice as much time as we occupied on this bill, and if there be any objection I make it four hours——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have just had a request for another half hour from a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request.

Mr. FLOOD. My request is that general debate be limited to five hours, two and a half hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and two and a half hours by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14516, the Diplomatic and Consular bill, and pending that he asks that general debate be no longer than five hours, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Virginia to press for a vote on the bill to-day or have it go over until to-morrow?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I have agreed to move that the committee rise at 6 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was about to ask the gentleman—it is now 12 minutes after 1—could not the gentleman run to 12 or 15 minutes after 6, which would close general debate?

Mr. MANN. It would not close at that time, but would probably run some time after; and there is a Republican conference set for to-night, and the gentleman agreed to quit at 6 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is the only thing I had in mind. There is no desire on my part to interfere with the conference, but I was wondering if we could not get 15 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. It is always probable that there will be more than 15 minutes lost during the day.

The SPEAKER. There is always some time lost. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14516, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14516, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14516) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, never before in history have the people of the civilized world desired permanent world peace so strongly as they do to-day. They have lost faith in the old methods of trying to prevent war. They demand the adoption of some new plan based on principles in harmony with the new spirit of democracy that is engulfing autocratic and arbitrary power all over the world. To meet this demand and to harmonize with the new conditions, I propose a world league of peoples for peace.

DIFFERENT FROM LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

When I use the term world league of peoples for peace, I do so to differentiate this plan from the league of nations plan which the rulers of the countries victorious in the world war are discussing. A league of nations such as they propose will in reality be a league of governments and therefore of government officials. The men who would be in charge of such a league could and would prevent many wars. It is because the free peoples of the world believe such a plan will prevent future wars that they so strongly favor its formation.

But even though such a league would prevent many wars, it could not guarantee permanent world peace, because under that plan the rulers of the various nations would continue to have the power to start a war without submitting the question of declaring war to the people. If we are to insure permanent world peace, or at least prevent all wars not desired by the people themselves, which will prove to be the same thing as the years go by, we must form a world league of peoples whose rulers can not start a war which will break the peace of the world until the people by majority vote have authorized them to do so.

TAKE POWER FROM RULERS.

Just as long as any man or set of men, and I care not who they are or what they are called, whether they be kings or emperors, presidents or premiers, members of houses of deputies, or of congresses, I say just as long as any man or set of men who are not required to do the fighting or the dying have the power to start a war which will break the peace of the world, that long we shall have war. [Applause.]

RULERS STARTED WORLD WAR.

The terrible world war which has just ended was started by the arbitrary act of one ruler, or at most of a few rulers, of the countries of central Europe. The people of Austria and Germany had nothing to say about its beginning. I confidently believe that if the Austrian people, held in subjection and kept in ignorance as they had been even, had been allowed to vote on the question of whether or not Austria would go to war against Serbia because a Serbian had shot an Austrian the Austrian people would have voted against war. If they could have prevented that declaration of war, the world conflagration would not have started. For, be it remembered, it was the Austrian Emperor's declaration of war on Serbia, July 28, 1914, that precipitated the world conflict.

But the Austrian Emperor was not the only ruler who had and exercised the power to declare war. The Kaiser declared war for Germany. The Czar declared war for Russia. The French cabinet declared war for France. The British ministry declared war for England.

When Austria declared war on Serbia, Russia mobilized to protect Serbia, as she was bound to do under her treaty with Serbia; and Germany mobilized to assist Austria. Then the Kaiser declared war on Russia and ordered his armies to invade France, because France was an ally of Russia. England was bound by treaty to protect the coast of France and maintain the integrity of Belgium, and entered the war when Germany invaded Belgium. Thus the act of the Austrian Emperor forced all of these nations into the war almost simultaneously.

CAN NOT VOTE ON SELF-DEFENSE.

This result was inevitable when Austria attacked Serbia, and Germany and Russia entered the war. War was a matter of self-defense and the fulfillment of treaty obligations. These questions could not be submitted to the people. There was not time to submit the question of self-defense to the people for a vote if national existence were to be maintained. Nor would there ever be time for that. But there was time before the beginning of this war, and there is always time before the beginning of any war which breaks the peace of the world, to submit the question of whether or not one nation will attack another, will invade another, will start a war against another.

IN UNITED STATES CONGRESS DECLARES WAR.

Yet in not a single country which afterwards entered the war would the people have been called upon to say by their votes whether or not their country would have started this war had it been their country, instead of Austria, that was faced with taking such a step. We boast of our democracy in the United States, but even here the people can not start or prevent a war. We have taken one step toward democracy, however, by placing the power to declare war in the hands of the representatives of the people. History shows, though, that while Congress does possess that power, in reality, the President exercises it.

CONGRESS ALWAYS OBEYS PRESIDENT.

Congress has always declared war when the President desired war and Congress has never attempted to declare war unless the President wanted war. That was true of the war of 1812. It was true of the Mexican war. It was true of the Spanish-American war. It was true of this war. It will probably be true of every war in which the Nation engages so long as the present method of declaring war continues. If we would prevent war we must place the war-making power of our Government under the direct control of the people themselves, just the same as must be done in other countries.

PEOPLE SHOULD CONTROL.

Why should the people not say for themselves whether or not their country shall go to war? They must do the fighting and the dying. They must make the sacrifices and bear the burdens. They and their children and their children's children, even unto generation after generation, must pay the cost of the war, not only in money but also in a physically and morally weakened race resulting from the loss of the flower of the Nation's manhood in war. Why should the people not vote on a question that affects so vitally not only their happiness and prosperity but the actual continuation of civilization itself and their own very existence on this earth?

PEOPLE WILL LEARN ABOUT INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

If it be said they do not know enough about international relations, I answer that placing in their hands the responsibility of deciding the greatest international question that can arise will of itself cause them to learn more about international affairs. Not only will the people of this generation become better fitted to pass upon international questions, but governments will find it necessary to provide for better education of the children of all the people in order to fit them for their enlarged responsibilities, and instead of teaching them the glories of war we shall teach them its horrors, its destruction, and its savagery. [Applause.] It will put an end also to secret international agreements, so often the hidden source of war, by forcing diplomacy into the open and compelling government officials to deal with foreign countries in such a manner that their conduct will square with the people's desires.

International affairs need be no more complex than national affairs. One of the methods which rulers have used for mystifying the people in the past has been to make international affairs as complex as possible and the results have been terrible. During the past 400 years the rulers of the nations have had complete control of international affairs and also of the power to declare war. And what has been the result? According to Frederick A. Wood and Alexander Baltzly, who have made a most painstaking study of the history of wars during the last 400 years, practically all of the leading nations of Europe have been in a state of war more than one-half of that time. Spain has been in a state of war 257 years; Russia, 238 years; Turkey, 232 years; Austria, 211 years; England, 207 years; France, 192 years. Surely the people could do no worse. [Applause.]

PEOPLE AGAINST WARS FOR TRADE AND TERRITORY.

If it be said the people will make mistakes, I answer that it will be better to let the people make their own mistakes than to force them always to suffer for the mistakes of others as in the past. There are those who fear that the people might vote against wars which certain rulers or particular interests that might profit by them would want. Their fears are justified too. For instance, I believe the people would never vote to start a war for securing new territory or more trade. Achille Loria, the noted Italian sociologist, after studying the causes of 286 wars decided that 258 were due to trade, territorial, and other economic causes, and that the other 28, while said to have been religious, were greatly influenced by economic causes. Thus, if the people should refuse to be guilty of trying to secure land at the cost of human lives or to win trade by the shedding of human blood most wars would be averted.

If a mistake is to be made regarding a declaration of war it is better it should be made on the side of preventing war rather than on the side of starting war, because if the people vote against war and it proves to be a mistake they can always rectify it by voting for war, but if a mistake is made by beginning a war and a nation becomes involved in the struggle there is no human power that can draw it out until the war has been fought to a decisive conclusion with all its attendant suffering, horror, and death.

PLAN IS DEMOCRATIC.

In fact, every objection that can be raised against the people's voting on the question of declaring a war that will break the peace of the world, when considered from the standpoint of democracy, becomes a new reason for the exercise of that power by the people. This proposition is not revolutionary. It is simply an extension of democracy to the war-making power. [Applause.]

PEOPLE VOTE ON EVERYTHING BUT WAR.

The people vote now on questions affecting them in minor ways. They vote on the question of prohibition. They vote on the question of woman suffrage. They vote on questions of taxation. In fact, there are practically no great questions affecting the people's welfare on which they can not vote directly or indirectly except the question of whether or not the men and boys of their country shall go to another country to kill and be killed by the men and boys of that country and thereby orphan the children, widow the wives, and mortgage the lives of the unborn generations of both countries. On that question they never have a chance to vote, because their rulers declare war, and once war is declared it becomes their patriotic duty to win the war. When the people are in the midst of a fight or have won it they can not go back and decide whether or not it should have been begun.

PEOPLE OF ALL NATIONS MUST HAVE POWER TO VOTE ON DECLARATION OF WAR.

For the people of one nation or of a number of nations to exercise the right of voting on the question of declaring a war when all the world is at peace will not be sufficient to insure world peace. That right must be exercised by the people of all the great nations of the world, so that no ruler or set of rulers can secretly agree to prepare and when prepared begin a war on the rest of the world, as will be possible under the league of nations plan by which it is expected to enforce peace.

I am not speaking against a league of nations. We want such a league established, because it will be a great step forward in the development of internationalism. But if it depend entirely upon force as the last resort to prevent war it will some day plunge the world into a world war worse than the one which has just ended. Sooner or later some rulers with the power to start a war will become so ambitious for military glory and world power that they will unite to defy and, if necessary, lick the league.

MAKE PUBLIC OPINION MORE POWERFUL THAN ARMAMENTS.

In order to meet such situations, reaching beyond the agreement which binds the governments into a league of nations, there must be another international agreement which lodges in the people of the respective nations the power to say finally whether or not, when the government officials of different countries can not agree, they shall be allowed to start a war which will break the peace of the world. When the threat of force contained in the army and navy of the world league can not prevent certain rulers from starting a war, the peoples of the world must then be able to call into operation a still stronger power to control those rulers, namely, the power of public opinion, quietly and unpretentiously expressed in little voting booths scattered all over the country in every community and hamlet of the land whose rulers desire to start a war.

LEAGUE OF PEOPLES WILL COME AFTER LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The fact that the league of nations will not always prevent war is not an argument against its formation. It is simply a reason for providing further means of preventing war after a league of nations has been formed.

It would be impossible at this time to make complete the formation of a world league of peoples such as I have discussed. The present rulers of the nations could not be induced even to consider its formation immediately. Once the league has been established, though, the free peoples of the world can then bring organized public opinion to bear in such a manner that they can democratize the league of nations sufficiently that its officials will formulate an international agreement embodying the principle of the people's direct control of the war-making power and submit it to the various Governments for ratification. Such agreement must provide also for the right of the people to repudiate unfriendly acts by a Government official toward another nation and to make full recompense to the injured nation for any wrongs that may have been done in cases where an official acted without authority.

TWO METHODS OF FORMING LEAGUE OF PEOPLES.

I believe this is the quickest, easiest, and most orderly way of bringing about this world-wide reform. But if such an international agreement can not be secured through the league of nations, the people themselves in the various countries can bring it about eventually by first compelling such changes in their respective Governments as will enable them to exercise the right of voting on the question of declaring a war when the world is at peace and their country is not in danger of invasion or torn by revolution or insurrection. Once the people win this power, they can easily force the making of treaties between the nations, providing each will not start a war against the other except by a vote of the people.

PEOPLE MUST ORGANIZE BRANCHES OF WORLD LEAGUE NOW.

But whichever method is used, the people will find it necessary to form branches of this world league of peoples in the various countries for the purpose of organizing public opinion to make it effective in bringing about the democratization of the war-making power of the nations at the earliest possible date.

MOVEMENT WILL BE OPPOSED BY THOSE WHO FEAR TO TRUST THE PEOPLE.

I realize the tremendous task to be performed in getting this movement under way. I know something of the forces that will fight it. Leading statesmen of the world, so called often because they are steeped in the precedents of the past, will declare the idea impractical and Utopian. Noted newspaper editors will ridicule it. Those who are afraid to trust the people will call it socialistic and bolshevistic. But that will not affect its progress seriously [applause] because it will be rooted in the hopes and purposes of the masses of the people everywhere who hate war and are determined to abolish it. [Applause.] More and more they will come to realize that the only certain method of abolishing war is to take into their own hands the control of the power to start war. When once they have become convinced of this truth throughout the world no human power will be able to prevent them from working their will, and its adoption will be the greatest advance of democracy in the whole history of popular government.

ABOLITION OF WAR IN HARMONY WITH DIVINE LAW.

War must end. The mother heart of the world pleads for it. The voices of humanity preach for it. The war-burdened millions of earth demand it. But only the votes of the plain people of the world can command it. [Applause.] It may take 10 years, it may take 20 years, or 50 years, or even 100 years to work this reform, but it will come. It will come because it is in harmony with the divine law, "Thou shalt not kill," and the human law, "The people shall rule." [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, with the close of the world war the United States finds itself in the largest sense a great world power. Indeed, it is perhaps not too much to say that we are to-day the great world power. Hitherto we have, as a Nation, thought and dealt in terms of a continent. Henceforward we must inevitably think and deal in terms of a planet. The transition means many a readjustment, many a realignment, of our national programs. The basis of our future world life must be a constant and an accurate store of information concerning our copartners in world trade, world thought, and world enterprise. Only as we possess this information can we advance intelligently and build wisely.

The source of the information must necessarily always be primarily our diplomatic and our consular services. Then it follows that the improvement at every point of these services is of the first consequence to our sound national and international development.

With this preliminary word, I come at once to the subject of my remarks to-day, a suggestion as to how to build up the personnel and efficiency of our diplomatic service. My suggestion should not be deemed to involve a criticism of the present; it is predicated simply upon the undoubted fact that the present is always capable of improvement. Reduced to lowest terms, the proposal is this: That so far as is legally possible vacancies in the ranks of our ministers abroad should hereafter ordinarily be filled from the ranks of secretaries in the diplomatic service who have demonstrated their fitness for promotion to the grade of minister.

At the top of our Diplomatic Service are, of course, the chiefs of mission—ambassadors and ministers. There are about 40 of these. Below them there are now some 88 secretaries, grouped into four classes. The pending bill provides for the increase of this number to 110. The ambassadors and ministers of the present moment are, as I shall hereafter show in some detail, generally men who have been appointed for some reason other than diplomatic experience. That is, they are, with few exceptions, men who have been appointed chiefs of mission directly from private life. The natural consequence of this is that they are untrained in the machinery of diplomacy. They must, then, depend largely upon their secretaries—men who have been in the service for years, who have made diplomacy a career rather than an incident, and who have the mechanics of their profession at their fingers' tips. Without in any way reflecting upon the ambassadors and ministers, we can instantly deduce the importance to the United States of having the right men in our corps of secretaries.

The secretarial force of to-day is not wholly satisfactory. There are many admirable men, but there are others who are not suitable representatives of the Nation in the complex, delicate, and important matters with which they are constantly dealing. Our problem is to weed out these latter men and to fill up the service with the highest possible type of secretary. How can we do this? Obviously by making the service more attractive to the right men.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The concluding remark of the gentleman has answered the very question I was about to ask, and that was: If there was promotion possible for secretaries, and if it should be generally understood that an appointment to that character of position would mean, if they made good, that they could ultimately hold even the position of ambassador, would it not attract a much higher grade of men to the position of secretary?

Mr. ROGERS. I will say to the gentleman from North Dakota that that is exactly the theme I am about to develop.

The limited appeal of our present service to the young men of the Nation whom we want and need to represent us is based upon two facts: First, the smallness of the salary, as compared with the cost of adequately maintaining the position at most of the world's capitals; second, because the position is to-day a "dead-end" occupation, with little or no outlet at the upper end.

At the present moment, as I have said, there are 88 secretaries, subdivided into four classes—16 in class 1, at $3,000; 16 in class 2, at $2,625; 36 in class 3, at $2,000; and 20 in class 4, at $1,500. The committee recommends an increase of $500 a year to each secretary, but this increase is subject to a point of order, and last year the point of order was actually made in the House upon a similar committee recommendation. The present scale of salaries is, of course, absurdly inadequate, in view of the very great importance of the position and of the expenses devolving even upon a bachelor to maintain it. For a man who is married, or who expects to be, it is a mere pittance—always remembering the high cost of maintaining the position and its grave responsibility and importance.

The State Department recommends a salary scale for the four classes of $6,000, $4,000, $3,000, and $2,500, respectively. Secretaries now in class 1, at $3,000—the goal for the lower grades—have served at least 11 years, and in some cases as long as 18 years. Secretaries in class 2, at $2,625, have served from 8 to 18 years. Secretaries in class 3, at $2,000, have served as long as 10 years. The appeal under these conditions is a very narrow one. No one not a rich man—or at the very least a man with considerable private means—can afford to apply. That this is undemocratic and undesirable for the Republic needs no argument. That the choice of the State Department in selecting secretaries is unduly constricted is equally clear. An adequate salary scale, as a matter of fairness and of efficiency, is essential.

But the other consideration, that the secretaryships are at present "blind-alley" occupations, is an even more potent cause of the present difficulty in attracting the right men. An ambitious young man, especially if he were a bachelor, might enter the service, even if doing so involved a considerable sacrifice, provided he saw a chance to rise when a few years had passed, and when he had made good, to something worth while. But when he sees first-rate men—men of the type of Butler Wright, Bliss, Grew, and Laughlin—receiving a salary of $3,000 after 15 or 18 years, he simply says, "No; I can not afford it; there is no future in it."

The wonder is, considering the low salary and lack of advancement, that the personnel of our service is as good as it is. It can never be better as long as the present method continues.

But if a man about to choose his career could see that merit might be rewarded with a ministership, the appeal would be much wider and more compelling. I propose, therefore, that so far as law can do it, we provide for promotion from secretary to minister. [Applause.]

There is nothing revolutionary in this proposal. When President Wilson was inaugurated in 1913 there were 41 United States ambassadors and ministers. With respect to previous diplomatic experience these were classified as follows: One had been ambassador at a previous post; 5 had been promoted from minister to ambassador; 4 had been ministers at a previous post; 14 had been secretaries in the Diplomatic Service; 3 had been consuls; 1 had been both secretary and consul; 13 had been appointed without previous diplomatic experience. Combining these we see that 10 had been ambassadors or ministers at a previous post; 18 were service men, promoted from secretary or consul; and only 13, less than one-third, were appointed without diplomatic experience.

What has been the history of the last six years? Four of the forty-one are still in the service. Fifty-one men have been appointed ambassador or minister since March, 1913. Only 2 of the 51 so appointed have been secretaries or, indeed, have had previous diplomatic experience of any kind. One of the two service men was appointed to Colombia and the other to Haiti. Neither post would be regarded as a prize.

Many of the new men appointed have been entirely creditable. But when we look over the appointments to the Latin-American Republics, mostly under the régime of Secretary Bryan, we can not fail to be startled at the complete lack of consideration given to merit, ability, or useful experience.

The darker side of the picture is, however, the discouragement to excellent men in the service when they saw themselves passed over time and again for party hacks and political hangers-on. No wonder they resign. No wonder it is difficult to induce the right men to enter the blind alley.

The solution is simple—to provide an outlet for the promotion of good secretaries to the grade of minister.

How far can Congress do this? Article II, section 2, paragraph 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides, in part, that the President "shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls," and so forth. The appointment of ambassadors and ministers being a prerogative of the President, Congress can not prescribe whom he shall appoint or how he shall appoint.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. You said a moment ago, I think, that you were in favor of promoting secretaries to ministers and ambassadors.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; and I shall develop that idea in a moment. My suggestion at present is that we promote secretaries to ministers, and leave out for the moment, at least, the question of promoting secretaries to ambassadors.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I wish to say that recently, in the consideration of a special case, I was informed that they thought it was important to adopt a policy of appointing consuls to secretaries.

Mr. ROGERS. My query is whether we ought not to go farther than that, and whether we ought not to appoint good consuls general, and perhaps the highest type of consuls also, to the position of minister.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Of course, we are getting a higher type now on account of the civil-service examination for consulships, and therefore they are appointed to take the part of secretary.

Mr. ROGERS. There is no doubt about that. There is a larger appeal to men of small means to enter the Consular Service than the secretarial service. But if the gentleman will bear with me for a moment I want to discuss that exact point a little farther on.

Congress can, however, indicate its view of the proper method, and can insure both that the President shall have the information upon which he can appoint upon a merit basis and that the public shall know what that information is. Then, if the President chooses to appoint some one not in line of promotion, as he will always under the Constitution have the right to do, the Congress and the people will have the facts to enable them to decide whether the action was in any given case justified.

Specifically, my proposal is this: That a board of four examiners for the Diplomatic Service be created in the Department of State, composed of an Assistant Secretary of State, the chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission, a law officer of the State Department, and one other officer designated by the Secretary. This board shall from time to time, but at least once annually, certify in writing to the Secretary of State a list of the names of those secretaries in the Diplomatic Service who by reason of character, ability, efficiency, experience, and general availability, and without regard to political or other affiliations, have demonstrated fitness for promotion to the rank of minister. Such list shall, so far as possible, enumerate in order of fitness those so certified, and each list so certified shall be complete in itself and shall supersede all lists previously certified. Whenever there is a vacancy in the rank of minister in the Diplomatic Service, the Secretary of State shall transmit in writing to the President and to the Congress, together with his detailed recommendations, the names of three or more of the secretaries enumerated upon the most recent list so certified whom he deems most worthy of promotion to the rank of minister.

If this plan is to be put into successful operation, the full, pitiless light of publicity must be turned upon it. If the light of publicity had been ready to turn upon appointments to Latin America in 1913 and 1914, it is perfectly safe to say those appointments would not have been made. [Applause.]

This method will not fetter the President. It will simply give him data which are certainly material, but which he may accept or disregard as he deems best. Its value is largely in the provision that Congress shall be furnished with the same data, so that it may form an intelligent opinion as to the wisdom of the President's decision. This provision will be of especial utility to the Senate, which, under the Constitution, has the duty to confirm or reject the President's selections.

If it be said that the provision is useless, the force of public sentiment is overlooked. If it be said that it is needless, we need only survey the appointments to Latin America in 1913 and 1914. If it be said that it is valueless, we need only point to the great incentive it would furnish to secretaries already in the service to persevere, and to the best young men in the land to embark upon the Diplomatic Service as a career.

It will be noted that my proposal does not comprehend appointments as ambassador. My thought is that there ought to be a wide latitude vested in the President's selection of his ambassadors—a latitude which may comprehend considerations of distinction in letters, economics, education, or government. It would be open to objection to throw even a conditional barrier in the way of the appointment of a man like Washington Irving, Bancroft, Motley, or James Russell Lowell, or Lord Bryce, or, more recently, of Walter Hines Page, who as truly and as usefully laid down his life for his country as if he had fallen in Flanders. Furthermore, as we have only 13 ambassadors, all to the great countries of the world, a bad appointment is so notorious as to be avoided at all costs by an administration for the sake of its own repute. These considerations are much less potent when the ministers are being selected, as our experience in 1913 and 1914 proves. So, while many arguments in favor of the promotion of secretaries to ambassadorships, either directly or through the intermediate step of minister, may be adduced, we do not run the same risk here. It may therefore be well, I think, to take the first step and then consider whether we shall later take the second.

It is perhaps fair to say, in view of Mr. Lansing's scrupulous regard for the merit system in the appointment and retention of secretaries and consuls, that if he had been Secretary of State in 1913 the policy of promoting secretaries to ministers, so frequently found in the Roosevelt and Taft administrations, would have been much more common and that we should have avoided the worst excesses of the Bryan régime.

A very plausible argument may be made in favor of extending the principle here advocated so as to encourage the promotion of consuls to the rank of minister. I should personally welcome such an extension. But there are some considerations which make the case of the consul weaker than that of the secretary. In the first place, he is not in direct line of promotion; his work is primarily commercial rather than diplomatic. In 1913 only one of the ambassadors and ministers whom Mr. Wilson found in office and who had had previous diplomatic or consular experience had been trained exclusively on the consular side.

In the second place, the salary range is far higher in the Consular Service than in the secretarial. A consul begins where the secretary stops. The consular salary range is up to $12,000; the secretarial up to $3,000. There is thus a far greater incentive to enter the Consular Service. Further, there are now some 321 consuls general, consuls, and vice consuls, and under this bill, if enacted as recommended, there will be 496. The corresponding figures for secretary are 88 and 110. The field is thus numerically four or five times as large, and the opportunities for promotion on merit more numerous. And, finally, the President would always have power to promote an especially valuable consul general or consul, even if the law here recommended were passed.

As I have before pointed out, there is nothing revolutionary in the proposal here advocated. The United States, under Roosevelt and Taft, saw its practical adoption. Every other great power, so far as I am aware, recognizes the policy. Great Britain adheres to it except when special considerations make it preferable to deviate. It sends Lord Reading and Lord Bryce to Washington without previous diplomatic experience. These men were wanted for special work which it was believed they could perform better than service men available. On the other hand, Great Britain promotes from secretary to ambassador or minister, to cite only a few men now or recently in Washington, Sir Cecil Spring Rice, late ambassador here; Lord Paunce-fote; Mr. T. B. Hohler and Mr. Colville Barclay, lately counsellors of embassy here; and Sir Maurice de Bunsen, who was recently here in transit to South America upon a most important diplomatic mission.

The Diplomatic Service will never thrive unless we give worthy secretaries a fair chance, and this country's foreign relations will never be completely successful without the best possible Diplomatic Service. We should, therefore, at the earliest possible moment, establish upon a firm footing the merit system for promotion of secretaries. Only thus will the best timber in the United States, whether possessed of private means or not, be induced to embark upon diplomacy as a permanent career.

COST OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

Members of the committee—to deviate from my prepared remarks—will perhaps be startled at the large increase which is called for in connection with our Consular Service. We propose, as I have just said, to increase the number of consuls and vice consuls from 321 to 496, something like 50 per cent. When that point in the bill is reached, if there is any controversy upon it I think it can be pretty conclusively established that the increase in number and in fact is largely apparent rather than actual. But at the same time I want at this point to call to the attention of the House that the Consular Service is very largely self-supporting; that while in this bill we appropriate considerable sums for salaries of consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, consular agents, and consular clerks and for the operating expenses of maintaining that force, at the same time we get back in actual money from this Consular Service an amount which in ordinary peace times practically compensates us for every dollar expended. And I shall put in the RECORD a table which shows the budget of the Consular Service for the past 12 or 13 years.

In 1906, which is the last instance of the kind, there was an actual profit to the United States from its operation of the Consular Service. In other words, we took in more from fees and from other sources of revenue than we expended in the aggregate for the Consular Service. There was more or less fluctuation from 1906 to 1914, but in 1914 the net cost of operating the Consular Service, leaving entirely aside the value and the necessity to the country of maintaining it, was something less than $50,000.

Of course since the war it has been necessarily true that the consular fees have fallen off very much, because consular fees depend upon trade, and, as international trade has fallen off, consular fees have fallen off with it; so that for the past two or three years the net cost of maintaining the service has been gradually mounting up. Now that peace conditions are being restored, there will no doubt be a recurrence to the old condition, and it will again be found that the Consular Service will practically take care of itself. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] consume?

The CHAIRMAN. He consumed 25 minutes. He yielded back 5 minutes. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, it is not my desire nor intention to make a long speech at this time, but I feel it incumbent upon me as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee and of this House to discuss somewhat the merits of the bill now before us.

The Diplomatic and Consular Service of this Government has played a large part in the conduct of the great war which has now ended. Other departments of the Government have received vast public attention and large praise from the patriotic people of the land. This service, however, performing its duties without publicity, 3,000 miles or more away, without hope of great reward in a financial sense, has perhaps done more than any other noncombatant branch of the service toward the winning of the war. It has engendered in the hearts of the people of the world friendship and good will toward America. It has conducted its business under adverse circumstances and, while the work has been enormously increased, with efficiency and dispatch, and cost the Government proportionately less than any other branch.

It is my desire at this time to focus public attention toward this service through this representative branch of the Government and to call attention to the fact that during the coming years, if we would keep pace with other countries, if we would have our place in the sun, it must be done largely through the Diplomatic and Consular Service. Not alone must we expect the extension of our friendship with the peoples of other lands through this branch, but we must likewise expect the enlargement of our foreign trade through this service in the hands of men abundantly qualified to perform the work, with a willingness and an aptness to meet the people and to establish greater commercial relations with them throughout the entire world.

The Diplomatic and Consular Service represents, as it were, the very hands and brains of the executive department in foreign countries. It assumes that relationship with those countries at first hand which the President endeavors to promulgate through the executive branch of the Government at Washington. Through the representatives of this branch of the service we are enabled to get next to the governments of foreign countries, and through the treatment of this service to obtain their good will or to dispel it.

In the years to come much will depend upon this service as to what benefits we reap from the great war which we have just fought, both in a friendly and financial sense. Our Government has expended billions of dollars in the preparation and transportation of troops, in the conduct of the war, in the manufacture of munitions, in merchant marine, and in loans to our allies. Whether we shall reap a just reward for these great expenditures, whether the name of our country shall stand aloft in foreign lands, will depend largely upon the men of this service.

The war having closed, the great battle for business will surely ensue, and the success of our country in this great endeavor will likewise largely depend upon the service under discussion. I think there is no doubt in the minds of the Members of this House that this service has been admirably conducted during the great conflict, that its members have gathered to us friends in every clime, that our citizens have been cared for and protected, and that citizens of other countries have been given every advantage which it was possible to afford.

It is therefore the duty of Congress to recognize in every way possible this particular and unswerving performance of duty. It has always been my desire to see this service well maintained, extended, and every opportunity given for its betterment and enlargement wherever the circumstances demanded. To that end I have always been an advocate of providing in the various countries homes for our embassies, so that they may have permanent quarters, no matter who may occupy them.

A few years ago we made a splendid purchase in the city of Shanghai, China. This property no doubt is worth to-day a large sum in advance of what our Government paid. This policy should be carried out in all the countries, and I am sorry this bill can not carry the sum of $3,000,000 to be expended by the Government in the purchase or erection of embassy homes. It is a policy which has been adopted not alone by the large countries of the world, but many countries that could less afford to do so have found wisdom in this adoption. The little country of Cuba, for instance, has erected in our city a magnificent embassy, as have many of the other countries. Why should not this country of a hundred million souls provide homes?

We erect fine buildings throughout our land for the use of various branches of the Government, but until this time we have neglected to erect such buildings in foreign lands, where naturally they would be of immeasurable benefit.

During the war we have extended our trade largely in our sister Republics of Central and South America. Surprising as it may seem, even before the war we did a larger business with the Central and South American Republics than any other country. In 1913–14, before the European war began, the United States was doing a business with them of $800,000,000; in 1917 it had grown to the enormous sum of $1,750,000,000, or an increase, approximately, of a billion dollars.

Just before the war broke out the United States was doing a business of $800,000,000, Great Britain $650,000,000, and Germany $450,000,000. At this time the United States finds itself doing a business with Latin America equal to all the other countries of the world combined. Let the great work proceed; let us reach every business man of that 80,000,000 people living, as it were, at our very doors.

Whether or not we shall continue to do this great business will likewise depend upon the men who represent us at those places and upon the great work of the Pan American Union.

The policy heretofore adopted of placing the Consular Service upon a civil-service basis is largely accountable for the wonderful progress we have made. It has given us men of distinction and ability, who could adopt that service as a life work. It has given them an opportunity to give to their country the best that is in them, without fear of removal at each change of administration or the change of mind of any Executive. I hope and I believe that this system will be extended to cover very largely the Diplomatic Service as well, so that we may have in that service men to occupy those positions who have made a long study and practice of the profession, who are able to meet the various emergencies and duties which constantly devolve upon them. Many new nations will be formed. Self-determination will largely prevail, and to meet the requirements of these various countries it should be our policy to have men of large experience and ability. I am therefore in favor of taking some step which will eventually cover this situation, which I believe to be a defect in our present Diplomatic Service.

Some years ago when we appropriated $20,000,000 to pay Spain for the Philippines the amount seemed large and was much commented upon, but to-day under different circumstances and world conditions we appropriate $100,000,000 to feed the starving people of Europe, many of them formerly our enemies, and we hear little criticism but a vast degree of praise from this broad land of ours. Our people have been educated by war conditions to big and generous propositions.

We are not asking for territory nor indemnities, but we are asking for the friendship and good will of the entire world. It is our great desire to stand aloft as an exemplification of what a well-governed and modern Republic can perform. Man has long since learned that he can be great only through the assistance of his friends; this applies not alone to individuals but to nations as well. The long continuance of the great work of our country and its appreciation by other countries must be brought about through the extension of this friendship and a belief that we will perform those things for which we profess to stand.

This Diplomatic and Consular Service properly manned, as it is, with the splendid support of its Government, can do more toward bringing this to a successful conclusion than any other branch of the Government. Our boys have taught the world what a Republic can do in time of war. It has taught them what they can do fighting for the freedom of the people and the life of democracy. These peaceful troops represented by the Diplomatic and Consular Service can reap great rewards not alone in friendship and good will but likewise in the extension of the commerce and business of our country.

This bill, I believe, goes a long way toward making proper and just provision for this splendid branch of the Government and will encourage them in their magnificent work and tell them that Congress and the people appreciate their wonderful and unswerving duty to the policy and interest of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland yields back five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I merely rise to explain my vote on the rule which was voted down an hour ago. I am heartily in favor of the proposition to erect in foreign countries buildings for the use of our ministers and ambassadors. I believe the time has come—in fact, is overdue—when the dignity and the might and the wealth of this country shall find its expression in suitable buildings for our representatives abroad. My reason for voting against that rule was not that I am opposed to the proposition or the principle involved, but because I think at the present time, with the taxpayers of this country suffering under the terrific burden of the war, making every sacrifice for the triumph which has come, they should not be subjected to a further burden by having great appropriations passed for buildings which are not absolutely necessary at this time. This proposition can wait. It can wait three or five years without serious harm, and then when conditions again become normal we can embark on this meritorious project. No one realizes more fully than I the inadequacy of the ambassadorial offices and residences in foreign countries, wholly out of keeping with the dignity of our representatives and out of harmony with the greatness of our country and its position among the powers of the world. Only men of wealth can afford to accept those important posts. For the Government to own these buildings would be a move toward democracy, an advance to that plane comparable with the power of the Nation, and I shall welcome the time when I feel that I can, with justice to the people, vote for this proposition. But, as I do not feel that this time is here, I voted against the rule presented by the committee to-day.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, by direction and under the authority of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I did not vote because I was not in the House for the rule referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], by which appropriations for the construction or acquirement of legation buildings in the various countries of the world were to be made in order. I wish that we could acquire or have constructed buildings to house our ambassadors in the principal countries in the world. I would vote for a reasonable bill to that effect, but I do not want any half-million or million-dollar structures. It seems to me the legation building in Washington of the British Government, if I recollect aright, was constructed about 40 years ago at a total expenditure of $50,000. It is a practical building; it is a democratic building. I would be very glad if I had the power to speak into existence a similar building for our Government in every one of the principal countries of the world. Our ministers and ambassadors who are poor spend their all, frequently, while they represent our Government.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. About what would a building similar to the British Embassy here cost in the countries where we want to build embassies? Does the gentleman know—about what?

Mr. CANNON. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Would it probably be about $100,000?

Mr. CANNON. I should say that the building, without regard to the site, could be constructed for about $100,000. I feel quite sure of that, although I am not a builder.

Mr. FLOOD. What does the gentleman think the site would cost?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know, because I am not "up" in real estate matters in the various countries of the world. I would say $100,000, probably.

Mr. FLOOD. Our ambassador to France has been here for the last few days. He has been living in a building in Paris that he pays $12,000 a year rent for. That is on a long lease that he has had for some time. When he goes out the rent will be raised to $18,000 a year. That building is valued at $550,000, and it is not as good a building for embassy purposes as the British Embassy in Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman says it is valued at that?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. That is what they asked for it. The least amount that they have been able to get the owners to consider was $550,000.

Mr. CANNON. I am quite sure that the British Embassy Building here did not cost to exceed $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman has referred to the value of the British Embassy property here in Washington. Figures I obtained two years ago from the assessors of the District of Columbia show that the total actual value of that property is $308,000.

Mr. CANNON. I think very largely for the ground.

Mr. ROGERS. It is broken up. The assessed value of the land is rated at $111,000 and the assessed value of improvements $94,000, or a total assessed value of $205,000. The assessed value is based on two-thirds of the real value, so that in this case the real value would appear to be $308,000.

Mr. CANNON. I would not split on $50,000 or $100,000, so far as that is concerned. The rich men—and I might call some of their names—can go abroad. They can have legation buildings, and they can have buildings that they either own or lease for the hot weather. You put it out of the power of a man of modest means, frequently more competent perhaps than somebody who has $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 to serve the Government, whatever his capacity may be. I have in my mind's eye now a former Member of this House. I am not acquainted with his wealth, except by hearsay, but I am very glad that he represents our country in one of the principal capitals of the world. My understanding is—not from him, and I do not know that he would thank me for saying what I now say—that the savings of a lifetime, so far as his life has progressed, procured from his profession, will be gone when he is superseded by somebody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, all the world knows that in times of great stress great characters are revealed. Never before, perhaps, has it been given to any man to labor for such great causes and for such masses of mankind as during this great war period, now so victoriously ended. These days have witnessed weak men fall, but they have seen rise to power men of such splendid character and transcendent capacity as glorify the human race.

To-day the happy nations of the world are heroizing those whose deeds through the long dark hour have made those nations great and safe. It is well that it is so. A grateful nation will never lack heroic sons when the crisis comes. Our country, the mother of true democracy, should excel all others in doing honor to its citizens—those sons of freedom that have so lately determined the destiny of mankind. Immortal glory has been won by our brothers on the battle field of the world. So long as shall endure a record of man's achievements, so long shall the ages know the deeds of America's sons on the blood-soaked soil of France. The world was staged for the great act. A cruel, insolent and haughty foe sought to conquer and crush the world. The resources and the heroism of the allied nations could not defeat him. With successive, hurculean blows he was beating those nations to the earth in one last supreme effort when the sons of America, a mighty host, reached the scene of conflict and knew not how to retreat. When those boys of ours turned against the Germans at Chateau-Thierry they turned the tide of human history. Belleau Wood, Vaux, Chateau-Thierry, the Argonne, the Ardennes will be to the schoolboys of the future what Bunker Hill, Saratoga, and Yorktown have been to us. Not Miltiades on the plains of Marathon; not Martel on the field of Tours; not Richard pounding at the gates of Jerusalem, played in the human drama a part more heroic, more glorious, than that of the sons of America who fought along the Marne, the Meuse, and the Meerthe. All honor to these fighting sons; all glory to their deeds. But America's work has not all been done, nor some of it the most important, by those who were clad in America's uniform.

There is another son of our country, of whom I would speak to-day, one whose service to this land of ours during the long period of war stands out conspicuous even in these days of greatness and achievement, one who died for his country, as resolutely, as nobly, as any soldier ever died for the country he loved. I speak of Walter Hines Page, late ambassador to Great Britain. He was truly a remarkable man, a wonderful man. The smoke of battle must disappear from the earth, the perspective of a distant year when his work shall be better known must come, before the world will know him and measure his deeds.

The Court of St. James has been the most important diplomatic post under the American flag. The line of illustrious men who have represented our country there presents many of the greatest names in our history. In truth, their lives form a large part of the history of our country. Five of these—John Adams, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Martin Van Buren, and James Buchanan—later became Presidents of the United States. In the list are also found the names of Rufus King, William Pinkney, Albert Gallatin, John Jay, and Thomas Pinckney, among the most brilliant intellects our Nation has produced. In this list are many of the foremost names in American letters—George Bancroft, James Russell Lowell, Edward Everett, and Charles Francis Adams.

In recent times we find such names as John Hay, Joseph H. Choate, and Whitelaw Reid. Walter Hines Page was the last of this illustrious line and, in my judgment, the greatest, if service is to measure greatness. No other diplomatic representative of our country in all our history ever had as many and as difficult burdens laid upon him. Hardly had he adjusted himself to the duties of his exalted position, acquainting himself with the English people and all branches of their government, when the great war like a thunderclap from a clear sky struck Europe. There were more than 50,000 Americans abroad, frantically struggling to escape from the scene of conflict. Letters of credit were valueless and all were in financial straits. Means of transportation were uncertain and often unobtainable. They managed somehow to get to London and there found asylum under the protection of Ambassador Pagė. Great mobs besieged his home and the American Embassy. He and his staff—in fact, his entire personal and official family—worked night and day during weary weeks and months. The multitude had to be fed, housed, and a passage home secured. Yes; even though passenger ships had nearly ceased to sail, a passage home somehow had to be found. What a motley throng they were! Millionaires, teachers, negroes, Indians and cowboys from stranded wild-west shows, elbowed and surged in one great American throng. Millionaire and negro, teacher and cowboy, looked alike to Mr. Page. It was enough that they were Americans, and each received the best Mr. Page could do or give. Many a poor cuss, penniless and stranded, without credit at home or abroad had his passage home paid by the American ambassador with no possible hope of return.

But this was only a part of his work. During those whirlwind days, and during all the days for nearly three years, the diplomatic relations between America and Great Britain were at fever heat. America was the only great power of the world then not engaged in the great conflict. The fleet of mighty Britain dominated the seas of the world, and the rights of our great neutral country were often jeopardized as Britain fought for her life. Distant as we were from the zone of conflict, and feeling it our duty to be perfectly neutral, we could not and did not appreciate the necessity which England believed made legitimate many acts of hers on the high seas. It is not too much to say and to say it is not divulging any secret that ought to be hid, there was a time when our relations with Great Britain reached practically an impasse.

Then, too, Great Britain was forced to look to this country for her food supplies and for prodigious quantities of war material. Amidst these difficulties and these enormous burdens, Ambassador Page represented our country so skillfully, so tactfully, and in a manner so broad and high minded, that in the end America and Great Britain were more friendly, more closely knit together, more zealous, each in good will toward the other than at any time since Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence.

The cementing of these two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, their union in point of view as to world affairs, and their determination to cooperate toward democracy and the betterment of humanity is likely to be the greatest result of the world war. This reunion, if I may use the term, of America with the mother country was occasioned in no small degree by the work of Mr. Page. No lesser man could have achieved so important a result. To understand how it were done we must regard the man who did it. And this brings us to the wonderfully human qualities this representative of our country possessed. Usually an ambassador, being a most august personage, dwells in a court or governmental circle, meets a limited blood or governing aristocracy, and orders his life according to strict court etiquette and time-honored precedent. But that was not the kind of an ambassador Mr. Page was at all. Probably no other representative we ever sent to the Court of St. James knew the Government officials of that country as intimately as he did, but he did not stop there. His broad sympathies, his cosmopolitan Americanism caused him to like all humanity, and he became acquainted with the English people. When we consider the constitutional and native aloofness of the English character, we are ready to understand how great an achievement this really was. He not only became acquainted with them, but they with him. Their relations verged on the intimate. In revealing himself to the English people he unconsciously revealed to them America at her best. Most of those people knew nothing of America, but they came to know him and ascribed to America and Americans those splendid qualities he so continuously displayed. His character was the most perfect exemplification of ideal Americanism our age has presented to a foreign country. He ceased to be a personage in England, he became an American institution. His influence pervaded everywhere. The men in the factories, the boys on the street, the million and more women toiling in Britain's war industries, financiers, and statesmen could all talk almost intimately of the American ambassador. They all knew him and honored him, and in him they felt they had a friend. And they did have. I measure my language when I say the English people learned to love Ambassador Page. We should therefore be prepared to hear that the British Government, when the war hour was the darkest and some sections of their country were dominated by pacifists, sent this American out among the people to counsel with them, inspire them, nerve them to the conflict. Some of his speeches to the people were printed and circulated throughout the land. A moment's reflection would disclose what an extraordinary rôle this was for a foreign ambassador to play, and he did it without once violating any of the rigid proprieties of his position or in any way offending the most sensitive taste. This was not the work of a diplomat. It was the work of a great human heart, one big with sympathy, one zealous to serve his fellow men.

When in London a year ago I observed to a group of Englishmen that the most interesting thing I noted in their country was that England had again discovered America. We, whose homes have never been in immediate danger from the savage Hun, we whose country we have never thought for a moment in danger of destruction, can hardly appreciate the feeling of the English people when America came to their aid. They haven't said much, but they have thought a lot. The flower of their kingdom had gone to France and fallen in the great conflict.

The thunder of the German guns could at times be heard reverberating among Albion's hills. From the heavens at night were continually dropping missiles of death and destruction. The deadly submarine had brought England almost to the hunger point. Then the young giant of the west came to their aid. Instantly anything American became intensely interesting to the English. The wealth, the manpower, the national characteristics, the purposes, and the plans of the mighty Republic became matters of the deepest interest to the English people. Ambassador Page at this critical moment gave to the English an ideal conception of the American people. The regard in which he was held by the English caused them to accept in full every expression he uttered. For nearly a century and a half the two great English-speaking races have been separated, sometimes by conflict, often by misunderstandings, all the time by latent suspicion. Happily for us and for the world, these days are past. It has been given to no man to perform so conspicuous a service in thus reuniting these two great peoples as that performed by Ambassador Page. A work of this character stands preeminent in the statecraft of our time.

Mr. Page quickened the thought and touched the life of the English in many ways they knew not of. The greatest result of this war to England herself will be the social and economic transformation that is now occurring. The social strata of old England have been sadly shaken up by this strife. Many of the families of the aristocracy have practically ceased to exist, and all have been terribly decimated. The flower of English chivalry was the first to rush to England's defense, and most of it now lies buried beneath the soil of France. The ancient privileges of birth will not henceforth be as hallowed as they have been heretofore. Men of all classes have stood on the same level and fought in the same way for their common country. Class distinctions under such service in such a time must inevitably fade away. In the industrial life of England the workers henceforth will receive a larger share of the profits of industry. The morrow is to be a very much brighter day for the common people of England. This movement upward on the part of the English masses has come from a better and wiser understanding of true democracy by all classes of English society. During the past two years America has exerted a very marked effect upon English thought, whether the English knew it or not. There can be no doubt that the democracy of America spoke through Ambassador Page to the democracy of England. The result will be far-reaching. President Wilson was no doubt surprised, as all America was surprised and pleased, at the warmth of the reception recently accorded him by the English people. Much of this unquestionably was a tribute personal to the President, but much of it was a tribute to the American people springing from an appreciation of America's help and of those American qualities they have seen revealed in the character and deeds of Ambassador Page. It appears likely there will be singular harmony between the two great English-speaking peoples at the peace table in Paris. Let us not forget that this unity of feeling, thought, and purpose has been produced in no small degree by the years of labor, sacrifice, and achievement of our late representative in England. It is not too much to hope that the influence of his life will abide with the sons of England and America about the council board, ever keeping their hearts in sympathy, their purpose fixed on the betterment of the masses of mankind.

I have jogged pretty well over this world, one time and another, and have met in foreign lands many representatives of our country. Among them many stand out in memory for splendid courtesies extended and for the most excellent Americanism they displayed. But Ambassador Page was in a class by himself. Never at home or abroad have I met a man like him. I recall distinctly the evening I landed in London. Cold, wet, hungry, for I had been moving from France with troops for 24 hours and without water, food, or sleep, I presented myself at one of the leading hotels and signified my ambition to register and secure accommodations. It evidently was a matter of deep concern to them whether they should take me in. Perhaps I looked suspicious, even though I displayed my passport and my permission from the British Government to land on British soil. Several austere employees looked me over and very critically. The flunkeys looked at my baggage dubiously. They wrote down all the facts in my history and of my ancestry on both sides back to a time when memory runneth not. They sent me to the adjacent police station to be registered and more thoroughly examined by specialists. When I returned these solemn-faced clerks held a brief consultation and then somewhat dubiously consented to take me in. I was profoundly grateful. I was willing to kiss the hem of their garments for this token of marked condescension on their part. On the following morning I called at the American Embassy to pay my respects and was advised that Ambassador Page was confined to his home sick and had been suffering acutely for nearly a week. Returning somewhat leisurely to the hotel, perhaps two hours later, I seated myself in the lobby to read a newspaper. I had not proceeded far when a pompous voice rolled out over the throng, "Congressman MILLER." Panic seized me. Surely they had reconsidered my case and decided to throw me out. But there was nothing to do or say but to face it, so I stood up and answered. To my astonishment, a most gorgeously liveried flunkey, flanked by one of the clerks, who had been particularly haughty and unapproachable the night before, stepped up, both bowed nearly to the floor, and with great unction the flunkey cried out, "The American ambassador to see Congressman MILLER." It was literally true. Upon being advised by telephone that I had called he got out of the sick bed and came directly to the hotel. He had never seen me in his life, and I doubt if he had even ever heard of me. It was enough for him that a Member of the Congress of his country had arrived in England. He rose from a sick bed and came instantly to put himself at the service of the Congressman. In all the world this is unique in my experience, and I am ready to believe that no other ambassador of any country ever did such a thing. His call had a profound effect upon that hotel. During the two weeks I was there I was really embarrassed with attentive service. This incident gave me my first glimpse of the position our ambassador held in England and among the English people.

Usually, diplomatic and consular officials of ours are very courteous in responding to any reasonable request a traveler may make. And in this they are distinguished among all foreign representatives, but Mr. Page went out studying up ways in which he could be of service. His whole force of trained and expert assistants, his home, his friends, were all placed at the traveler's disposal. Within two days from the time I landed in London he had brought me into relationship, under the most advantageous circumstances, with practically every person in the British Government who could help me in the work I had on hand. And every day thereafter he was constantly on the alert for opportunities to be of service.

This treatment was in no sense exceptional to me; I am certain he accorded the same to all of his countrymen. One day he called and handed me a list of 14 American Congressmen. He had just received the names by cable from his home Government, with word they had sailed for England. He was full of energy. "Now, tell me, MILLER," he urged, "all about every one of these men. This is a great event. Never before has a great body of American Congressmen journeyed to England. I am going to see to it that this is a real event in England and that every honor is accorded them." How splendidly he succeeded every one of those Congressmen will, I am sure, bear willing witness. It was his great purpose to bring the English and American people into closer relationship, that they might become companions in the world's work. He labored for the one, the country whose representative he was, but at the same time he knew that this course would promote the welfare of the English people. How striking is the contrast between this purpose and this work and that of the recent ambassador of the German Government to the United States!

As Mr. Page was the most perfect American in character and conduct I have ever found in our country's service, so he was the ablest executive and wisest adviser our country has had in its Diplomatic Service in modern times. Our embassy in London during recent years has been a marvel of organization, efficiency, and lofty dedication to the country's service. It was "a Little America" in the heart of London. Mr. Page had taken the best secretaries that had been attached to Vienna, Berlin, and St. Petersburg and added them to his force. They constituted a remarkable collection of trained, diplomatic agents, excelling in zeal, spirit, and pure American ability. To these were added some specialists, selected with excellent judgment. The military attachés were up to the minute in all departments of their work. And there was Admiral Sims next door, with his unexcelled bureau; he and they writing a glorious chapter in the naval history of America. Then, in the same row, the American Red Cross. The organizing and presiding genius of this wonderful American colony was Ambassador Page. The amount of work to be done was enormous, and Mr. Page was never idle. To little things and big things that were worth while he zealously gave his best. And the work began to tell on his health. As the years went by he gradually weakened, but he kept steadily at his work. When urged by solicitous friends and fellow workers to go away for a rest he refused, saying there was too much to do and his country needed him there.

Our men alone could never have won this great war. The part woman has played constitutes a striking event in human history. Mr. Page alone could not have performed his great mission. This typical American man was blessed with a typical American wife. The sweet simplicity, the elevated dignity, the unfailing tact, the deep sympathy, the wonderful charm of this magnificent woman were of incalculable aid to the ambassador and brought to herself a distinct reputation in England. Her home was the best place in London to meet people worth while. The womanhood of England during this struggle has displayed a heroism that will challenge the admiration of the ages. With no sign of mourning, though their loved ones had fallen, with no sign of fear, though death fell from the heavens, with their great homes closed and living in comfortless quarters, they worked on for their country and their country's soldiers.

They cooked and they scrubbed and they washed for the fighting boys of their land. Their conduct, frankly, is the sublimest thing I have ever seen. Splendid as this was to see, an American was still more greatly thrilled as he beheld working beside them, vieing with them, yet often excelling them in service and sacrifice—for her talents, in the main, were greater—this representative of American womanhood. With a duchess on one side and a Scotch lassie on the other, she was ever present where service was needed and ever helping in those hard and difficult tasks that brought comfort to the soldier boys of England and America. Some day I trust an American woman, sensitive to the nobility of a woman's soul, will write of Mrs. Page's work and life in England during the great war. It is worthy the pen of a Tarbell.

It may be if one caught only a fleeting glimpse of this ambassador of ours he would be thought homely in form, but no one that knew him ever thought that of him. The bigness of his character and the splendor of his mind only were thought of. Like the woman who came from the presence of the great Lincoln, with a pardon for her son in her hand, and amid her happy tears, exclaimed, "And they told me he was a homely man." Mr. Page possessed many of Lincoln's elements of greatness. He was simple in manner, direct in expression, lofty in thought, and filled with human sympathies. To inspire love in one's fellow man, one must love that fellow man. And Page loved his fellow men. To be of service was as natural to him as to live. In a very human heart there reposed a lofty soul. In his presence you felt vastly more than your mind interpreted from what he said. He lived thought and feeling, and in this way exerted a powerful influence. He personified America as our ideals want America to be. After Mr. Balfour returned from his memorable mission to America, and that was his first visit to this country, Mr. Page called at the foreign office to welcome him home. As Mr. Page entered the inner room there sat the French ambassador on the right, the Russian ambassador on the left. Mr. Balfour rose quickly, advanced across the room to meet him, grasped both his hands, and silently looked him long, full in the eyes. Then, with voice that betrayed emotion, in degree, perhaps, greater than that veteran statesman ever evidenced before, he uttered these words, as though they welled from his soul, "Mr. Page, your people, your people; they are just like you; they are just like you." No higher tribute was ever paid to a man; no truer tribute ever paid to a nation.

When the news flashed over England 3,000 miles across the sea that Mr. Page was dead all England went into mourning. It is probable that there has hardly passed from the life of England any person in the last 25 years on account of whose death such deep sympathy, solemn regret, and universal love were expressed by the English people as occurred in the case of Ambassador Page. All of England mourned for him as for one of their favored sons. In these stirring times we have not yet paused to pay him proper tribute, both as to his character and his great work. It is that I may give you, if you please, the picture that I have of him and all that he stood for in England that I have taken these moments of your time.

Mr. Page knew nothing of the intrigue of diplomacy. His method was direct, straightforward, honest. His word was relied upon as soon as it was spoken. This standing before the English people was of the greatest value to them at the time we entered the war and enabled him to place our own position before the English people on the highest possible plane. Early in 1917 the English, looking ahead, saw ultimate defeat unless help came. Russia was crumbling; France was being exhausted; England and Italy had reached the zenith of their power. And yet they could not crush the German horde. The entrance of America into the conflict promised to change everything if America only would send her fighting strength to the field of battle. For a time France and England really wondered if America was in earnest; if our men really would come to fight. England had her jaw set and was fighting grimly on without complaint, without mourning, with no thought of giving up, but her people were praying in their hearts that America would come. Mr. Page was more than ambassador in this hour. He represented to them the incarnation of America's power. With serene confidence he whispered to these heroic and dying souls "Be not worried, my countrymen will come; they will come." A kind Providence lengthened his days, so that he saw them come, these stalwart sons of great America, these crusaders under freedom's cross, and turn the tide of victory. But he knew the end was near. He knew his days were numbered. For months he worked on, looking ahead straight into his open grave. Yet he faltered not, nor did he complain. He felt himself a soldier of his country, and it was his duty to serve that country, even unto death. At last that worn-out body could carry the burden no longer, and he took to his couch, saying, "I am tired and must rest." He knew it would be a long, long rest. And his heart yearned for the hills and the valleys of Carolina he so loved when a boy, and they bore him there, quietly and reverently. Those eyes, with a vision death had not yet dimmed, once more saw the clear skies and the sunshine of his native State, the land he loved so well, the hills he climbed when a boy, the old home that was associated with so much that was dear in his life. Then, with the bells of victory ringing throughout the land, with the world saved and again at peace, with the country he loved and served advanced high in grateful thought of mankind, his work ended, he went to sleep.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a year ago when this bill was under discussion I took the liberty of suggesting to the committee the propriety of certain changes in the bill. These changes did not meet with their approval at that time, but they now have. I am going to make another suggestion of a similar nature, in the hope that it may commend itself to the committee without waiting a year to find out that it is right.

Last year the bill contained an item for minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to Bulgaria, Roumania, and Serbia, $10,000. On the 7th of February last I suggested, in some remarks that were printed March 4, that Roumania, Bulgaria, and Serbia were not on such terms that they should have one minister; that, as a matter of fact, each of them ought to have one of its own; and that nobody could acceptably meet them all. I am glad to see that after the lapse of 12 months and some frightful fighting between our ministers—chargés in the Balkans—the State Department has learned that they are separate nations with conflicting interests, and has given each of them recognition with a minister of its own. I felicitate and congratulate the department upon the rapidity with which they get information with regard to foreign countries. I notice, however, that they have assigned one minister to Greece and Montenegro, and call the attention of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and of the State Department to the fact that Greece and Montenegro are located some distance apart. Anyone proceeding by the shortest route from Greece to Montenegro would have to go through Albania. Most of the people of Albania are laying for the Greeks. The other day I talked with a lady and a gentleman who spent considerable time last year in Albania—themselves Albanians—fighting the Greeks.

The only method by which anyone could get from Greece to Montenegro with any facility now would be by water, and under the conditions existing there that might be dangerous. I would suggest to the State Department and the Committee on Foreign Affairs that the people of Montenegro are Serbians. They speak the same tongue as the people of Serbia. Furthermore, their territory lies immediately adjacent to that of Serbia. It is quite likely that they will all be made one country; but, at any rate, they lie side by side and the facilities for getting across the border line are not bad. If this minister is assigned to two countries, he should be assigned not to Greece and Montenegro but to Serbia and Montenegro. I am going to offer that amendment, and I hope the committee will take into consideration the suggestion I make and confer with the State Department, and if the State Department, after months of investigation, find out that the relative geography of the countries which I have stated is correct, the State Department will perhaps permit them to accept that amendment. In the event that Serbia and Montenegro should be united, as they probably will be, then the minister will remain accredited to one country, and there will be no complications to iron out. I hope the committee will think that over and arrange it so that that can be attended to to-morrow without serious difficulty.

I notice, too, here that there is an ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary. I call the attention of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the fact that there is no such country as Austria-Hungary. That country has been totally demolished. The Emperor of it has lost his throne and there is no unification. Hungary has declared its absolute independence. Bohemia and Slovakia have declared their independence as one country—Czecho-Slovakia. The Italians have taken possession of considerable of Austria-Hungary. Yet you are arranging for an ambassador to Austria-Hungary with a salary of $17,500. He could not find that country if he should go there. Where is its capital?

I think the State Department ought to take judicial knowledge of that state of facts, which is so well known. We could take judicial knowledge of it anyway. The territories of Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, and Austria constitute three distinct nations at this moment. Immediately adjacent is Poland. Nobody in the world questions this fact except this bill. I do not think the department should come and ask for an ambassador to Austria-Hungary. If they wish to assign one person to that position at Budapest or Warsaw or Prague or Vienna, perhaps he could be assigned to Austria, Hungary, Poland, and Czecho-Slovakia, and it seems to me that it ought not to be necessary to make such elementary suggestions to the committee or to the State Department. You might as well send an ambassador to Babylon. The Austro-Hungarian Empire is wrecked and ruined, totally demolished and destroyed, and everybody knows there is no such country. Hungary has declared its independence. It has set itself aside. The Emperor has retired and they are going to sue him for a million dollars. Austria is simply a German Province and Vienna, I presume, its capital. Everybody knows it. Slovakia and Bohemia will be one country. Why pass such legislation as this? It will make us the laughingstock of the world. I hope that this suggestion will be sufficient.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit a question?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The recognition of a foreign government by this Government is exclusively within the jurisdiction of our executive department. Can the Congress of the United States, until the peace treaty shall be signed, do otherwise than follow the recommendation of the State Department as to the existence or nonexistence of foreign governments?

Mr. LITTLE. The Congress of the United States can make any appropriations it wants to that are not in opposition to the law of the land. The State Department will obey the instructions of Congress, because that department is loyal. The gentleman from Wisconsin says "can" we appoint a minister to Austria, Hungary, Poland, and Bohemia, one for all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will change the word "can" to "ought."

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; I think we certainly ought to. The only possible question to my mind is whether we can. That does not apply to my suggestion to attach Montenegro and Serbia. That is a simple matter. About that there is room for debate, but I think if you call up the State Department they could suggest some way out to the committee that would be mutually satisfactory to the legislative power and to the executive force.

It is true that we depend on treaties, but when we know that the treaties are dead and that there is no such country, why should we appoint an ambassador at a salary of $17,500 a year to such a place? It is preposterous. Suppose the State Department should ask us to send a minister to Judea, which has been dead 2,000 years.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How does the gentleman know that there will not be a government recognized as the Government of Austria-Hungary by the peace conference?

Mr. LITTLE. I am sure there can not be, because there is no such country. There is no demand for that anywhere.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It may not have the same territorial jurisdiction that existed before the war, but can the gentleman say, as the State Department did not say to the committee, that there will be no Austria-Hungary?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, I can; and I think that any intelligent man that reads the papers, whether he believes everything they say or not, must realize that there will be no such country and is not now. Hungary has asserted and settled its independence. It will have nothing to do with Austria. The Emperor is deposed and the ministers are dismissed. There is no possibility, as the gentleman from Wisconsin seems to suggest, that they may recognize such a country as Austria-Hungary. As a matter of fact, Austria will most likely be made a part of Germany in some way or other; at any rate, it will be independent of Hungary. I think it is much more intelligent to say that we will send some one to Austria and some one to Hungary and some one to Poland and Czecho-Slovakia, which really exist, than to send some one to Austria-Hungary, which does not exist.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That would mean that the Congress of the United States is anticipating the action of the peace conference. We would be declaring, if we enact such legislation, that Austria is to be one government, Hungary is to be another government, and that Serbia and other countries are each to have individual governments. In other words, the Congress of the United States would be specifically by legislation anticipating the action of the peace conference.

Mr. LITTLE. On the contrary, when you attempt to put this legislation through you are anticipating the conference by saying that the Austrians and Maygars have no rights of their own. They say that they are absolutely divorced, and you insist that they are not. What right have you to say that Austria and Hungary shall take the same minister, as one country? Hungary says she is a government by herself. Here you say Hungary is not; that Austria-Hungary are one. Where do you get the right to proclaim an empire across the sea which has no existence? You might as well proclaim Atlantis. What right have you to prejudge the case of the Bohemians? When you do that, you say the United States is against the freedom of Bohemia, for which they fought; against the freedom of Hungary, for which they have declared.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Can the gentleman inform the House just what kind of a government there exists to-day in Vienna and who is the head of it?

Mr. LITTLE. No; I can not.

Mr. HARDY. Is there any definite government?

Mr. LITTLE. I gather from the newspapers that the city administration is in control.

Mr. HARDY. No republic, no empire, no kingdom.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not think so. The Emperor has gone; he is out of a job; and the local council of some kind simply meets and holds the fort. In Bohemia—that is, Czecho-Slovakia—they have a President; in Poland they have a prime minister and a general in chief; in Hungary they have a government as well established as ours.

Mr. HARDY. And in Vienna?

Mr. LITTLE. I can not give the gentleman any information about that.

Mr. HARDY. At least, it is not now the capital of the Austro-Hungarian Government.

Mr. LITTLE. No; there is no capital. I do not think we owe any allegiance to the dead past. Let it bury its dead. I see that the Empire of Turkey is to have an ambassador at $17,500. Why should we put the stamp of our approval upon an empire already dishonored and dismembered? You and I know, as well as anybody, that that country will be split up into two or three parts, and Turkey will only be a very small part; that Constantinople will no longer be its capital. Why send an ambassador, at $17,500, to people who have demonstrated they are not fit to receive any courtesy or attention, and whose territory is largely in other hands permanently?

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. EAGLE. From the gentleman's long and intimate knowledge of that Far East situation, may I ask if it is not the gentleman's hope that when this peace conference shall have finished its deliberations it shall result in putting Turkey entirely out of Europe, and the taking of Constantinople and making a civilized community out of it, rather than leaving it to those brutes who have disgraced civilization and the world for five centuries?

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman is undoubtedly right. Every heart in Christendom beats with that hope. A year ago, on this floor, I spoke for a considerable time in favor of that proposition. Time has developed that my suggestions were not so far from what has happened. Constantinople will probably be a free city. Armenia, Anatolia—that is, Turkey in Asia—will be independent countries. England will take Mesopotamia, and something will be done with Palestine, to divorce it from Turkey. Turkey will be a little nation of four or five million people, and we should change from an ambassador there to a minister, at $10,000 a year. I hope the chairman of the committee will take this up with the department.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the committee provided for the diplomatic corps almost as it has been provided for heretofore. Not wishing to anticipate the action of the peace conference in determining what shall be the future of these different States, we appropriate for an ambassador to Austria-Hungary, just as we did when we had no diplomatic relations with that country, just as we did when we were at war with that country. We will do that until the conference determines what these countries are going to be, before we anticipate what is going to take place in the future and undertake to change things ourselves rather than wait for the peace conference to make these changes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, on the contrary, when you assign an ambassador at $17,500 to Turkey and at $17,500 to Austria-Hungary you do prejudge the action of the peace conference. You are apparently endeavoring to bolster up the government of dead empires, of ruined nations, that ought to be ruined and demolished. You seem to take sides with them. There is no reason in the world, there is no technicality that insists upon it; and when you say to Turkey that you will send her an ambassador at $17,500 you appear to be backing her up as against Armenia. There is a Republic of Ararat, around the Mount of Ararat, which has been recognized by Germany, by Turkey, by Russia, a free and independent republic. There is not a word in this bill about it. You have never recognized it. Why should you insist that Turkey should have an ambassador when your friend the little free Republic of Ararat, which won its independence on the battle field, does not even get a minister or any recognition?

Mr. FLOOD. We do not appropriate for ministers and ambassadors until our Government has recognized a country.

Mr. LITTLE. I am not offering an amendment in respect to Ararat. Everybody else has recognized it; we should. I notice here that the agent and consul general at Tangier is provided with $7,500 and the agent and consul general at Cairo with $6,500. The work of the agent and consul general at Cairo is with a much better settled government, better civilized, better adjusted government than that in Morocco. He has a great deal more to do. I heard this morning a great deal about sending rich men to these places. Cairo is the greatest social center in the wintertime in the world. There is more society there than anywhere in the world of the kind that appeals to rich men and women. If you are going to pay these big salaries, you ought to give this representative at Cairo another thousand dollars. He gets $6,500. He lives in a city of half a million people, a great city and a great social and diplomatic center. England and France and Russia and all those countries for years have fought out the battles of diplomacy there. Our man's English colleague resides in a palace that probably cost $250,000. It has been the battle ground of world diplomacy, with Lord Cromer as the center. The diplomatic agent there ought to have more money. The French agent has a palace. It is a job where a fellow could spend a good deal of money.

I want to say in that connection I am sorry to see this continual repetition of the theory that nobody but a rich man can be an ambassador. There never was a more nonsensical theory. The greatest ambassador we ever had was Benjamin Franklin, and he hardly had enough money to keep his shoes shined. It is like every other job.

A man's success depends upon the ability, the scholarship, the culture, the tact, the courage, and the luck of the man, just as in the Congress of the United States. The greatness of America does not consist in its wealth, but in the freedom of its people, the equality of its citizenship, the grandeur of its ideals, and the splendor of its history. These great fortunes are simply the burden-bearing servants of the Republic, like the machinery in the factories. They seek these diplomatic posts that they may get away from the democratic surroundings at home and bask in the artificial light of a useless social environment, which is one of the things we fought against in this war.

When you in this bill again provide for liveried ambassadors to the empires our soldiers fought to destroy, you lend encouragement to every king hiding in exile, to every enemy of common men who is biding his time in the anticipation that something may happen, to set back kings on their thrones, and throw back the world a hundred years. When you provide ambassadors to Austria and Turkey again you bring sadness and sorrow and fear to every brave and gallant soul in Bohemia, Croatia, Serbia, and Armenia. You give the world to believe that you stand for a European continent of kings and kaisers, emperors and tyrants, and that as the sun of liberty seems to rise in golden splendor upon a waiting world, upon quivering nations, this mightiest of all Republics doth frown and lower upon the hopes of half the world for the same rights and privileges and immunities we have in America. Are you here to merely repeat the views of some conference or is this the Congress of the American Republic competent to express the ideas of the American people?

The theory that you must send a rich man to Paris or London is all nonsense. When the campaign is on each side gets some rich man socially prominent to give them a lot of money and then rewards him with this job. Why, there is not much to it. And then they say to the scholars and orators, "You are too poor; otherwise, we would like to give you the job." There is no place in the world where character and ability do not set the status of the man, the hall mark on him. What does it amount to, a big house? You do not need a big house. That is simply a society matter of no consequence whatever, except to fat old dowagers and pretty girls. When I was appointed to a diplomatic post in Egypt I went and saw Gov. Osborn, of Kansas, shortly after he returned from Brazil, where he was an American minister, the most courtly gentleman in the State, and said, "Governor, I want a little advice. What have I to do?" He said, "Not a damn thing." I said, "What arrangements have I to make?" And he said the same thing. These diplomats have very little to do and cut very little figure in the world's affairs, and when there is anything to be done it is done from the State Department here, anyway; it is but a little social distinction that does not amount to anything. But when you talk about a consulate it is different. I will back every dollar that is put into them. The business of the country is done through consulates. I do not care about the spending of that money at Shanghai. You must remember that the consul general of Shanghai is a judge of as great importance as a Federal circuit judge of the United States and he has as important a jurisdiction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. May I have another five minutes?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Where you want to put your expenditures is upon the consulates to build up the business of the country. A man pops up here and wants to spend $5,000,000 on houses for ambassadors. What is an ambassador? He is the personal representative of a monarch, and what has become of monarchs? They have gone to hell, the whole bunch of them. It is just that, they are all done for. Then some one bobs up and says we need rich ambassadors all over the world. It is merely a social business, just a suit of clothes and a knowledge of how to turn down the corner of a coat. The governor said, "Have you a dress suit?" I said, "No." He replied, "That is all you need." Why should you, just when the countries of the world are killing off kings and abolishing them and putting the peoples of the world upon a democratic foundation, turn in and build great big houses that only a rich man can live in? This great Republic should be too big and powerful to do a thing of that kind. You should send men, simple, unaffected, direct men, like Benjamin Franklin was. You remember how he hung the key on the kite string in the bottle and brought the lightning down. My mother used to tell me the story of how, as he walked through some aristocratic salon in Paris, a disdainful duchess inquired sarcastically, "Who is that queer old man?" And the reply was, "Hush; he is the man who bottles up thunder and lightning." My friends, your ambassador wields the power of this great Republic—the thunderbolt of Jove. He is a man who bottles up the thunder and the lightning of modern authority and power. He does not need fine clothes or fine buildings. His word is a law to nations, for he speaks for 100,000,000 free men. This great Republic should stand upon the dignity of American citizenship.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And Franklin made his quaint garb the fashion of Paris.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. He was the observed of all observers, the center of every social circle, the power behind the throne. John A. Anderson, a grand Member of this House, was appointed to Egypt. They came to present a beautiful sword to him, an ancient custom, showing respect to him and his country, as they had to all his colleagues. He said to them as he looked over the present, "My country does not need the sword; you take it back to your monarch and tell him to use it for his own country." The custom terminated because our country laughed at it.

For 6,000 years the mankind has patiently waited for this hour. Destiny has designated our Nation to lead the way to a better future. For four years the world has been aflame with war and the earth has rocked and quaked with the woes of its citizens. Lincoln's name flames in the sky to tell us to strike down old and idle forms and inaugurate a diplomacy of common sense. Franklin long ago set us the example. Let the millionaires stay at home hereafter and manage their millions, while statesmen represent us who are typical Americans. My friends, this is the time for us to set a better example of economy and simplicity and dignity of character with our ambassadors instead of still sending men simply because they gave great sums of money as campaign funds to both parties. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss the propaganda that is being carried on in this country which takes the form of asserting labor has profiteered out of the war.

They say that labor has profiteered out of the war. They are charging that the men who work with their hands have taken selfish advantage of the war emergency to gain for themselves an unfair increase in wages. They say that the workers have not been patriotic, but have taken advantage of the situation to practically hold up industry and the Government itself in performing war work.

These charges are coming from various quarters, sometimes by direct statement, but more often by insinuation. A nation-wide propaganda, it appears, is being carried on. My mails are full of it. Scarcely a day passes that I do not receive some printed matter that directly or indirectly makes the charge of profiteering against labor. In the report of the proceedings of a recent convention of a great civic body a prominent spokesman for industry is quoted as saying:

> To-day I find men of great force in this Nation who, now that this war is over, talk about a surplus of labor, and that now is the opportunity for capital to reassert itself, because labor has prospered way beyond its share because of the war.

A prominent corporation lawyer has sent me a copy of his address delivered at a recent meeting of a bar association, in which he said:

> The workers are having a prosperity the like of which few of them ever dreamed was possible, even under the absurd promises of the professional architects of verbal Utopias. A very large percentage of the billions expended for war purposes in this country in one form or another has gone into the hands of workers—of those who labor with their hands.

An organ of big business, in its issue of December 15, 1918, makes an attack on labor organizations, from which I quote:

> Union labor attempted to capitalize the war for its own purposes, and succeeded to a very great extent. * * * The war did more for the unions than they were able to accomplish for themselves in many years, but a return of peace may imperil the spoils. This the unionists will not permit if they can help it, and they are trying to help it by compelling a governmental autocracy, a paternalism which they believe will be entirely for their own benefit, irrespective of its effect upon the country.

And so this reactionary propaganda goes on day after day. My table is littered with it. It appears in the newspapers. It is being sent to public men, the press, and employers of labor over the whole country. Usually this stuff carries with it a patter about "bolshevism," as though every workingman was an anarchist in disguise.

This propaganda costs money, lots of it. It has a purpose, evidently the selfish purpose of those who are paying the bills. It is important that public attention should be called to it, that the public should be warned and put on guard against accepting this stuff at its face value. If labor had profiteered, I should not attempt to defend it. The profiteer has been a public enemy during the war; he has hampered our country in its efforts; he has dissipated its strength; he has been a great hindrance in carrying on the war. The profiteer should be held up to scorn and execration.

SINISTER MOTIVES BACK OF PROPAGANDA.

It is not easy at first to fathom the purpose of this campaign of propaganda against the toiling masses of the people, but when we consider the sources from which it comes and analyze the innuendoes and arguments which accompany it we are able to discern that it has one or all of three purposes:

First, to discredit the laboring classes generally, to destroy public confidence in them and their leaders, and to create a public opinion which will justify harshness in handling labor disputes;

Second, to discredit public ownership of railroads and other public utilities, which is assumed to be favored by the masses; and

Third, to combat radical democratic movements and the assertion of political rights by the poor, whom the propagandists choose to dub "the proletariat" and to picture as being ready to leap at the throats of the rich.

The illiberal interests never sleep. They have a peculiar and inexplicable hatred and distrust of the common people. These interests are dissatisfied with the swing of the past decade toward an interest in the betterment of the condition of the common man and a fuller recognition of the rights which belong equally to all. They let no occasion pass to push the pendulum back the other way.

In the processes of readjustment, the stress of high prices for the common necessaries of life, with a surplus of labor already appearing, there will probably be industrial friction and strife. So that by this propaganda the big employers are seeking to create public sentiment which will excuse them for harsh measures toward those in their service. There can be little doubt that they have decided to make a determined effort to force down wages and to take away favorable conditions which workingmen have been able to obtain. This effort naturally will be resisted. If it succeeds the workers must accept lower living conditions and be put to greater economy and hardship. The great employers desire a state of public opinion favorable to their side. They want to have it ready-made when trouble comes. This is one of the meanings of the propaganda that is being carried on.

KNOW THE TRUTH.

It is important that the public should know the truth. I have investigated the subject of wages during the war and feel it my duty to give the facts. Labor has not profiteered but has been moderate and patriotic. Even with the number of workers greatly reduced on account of men taken for military service more work and better work has been done than in normal times. Men who work for wages have enthusiastically supported every war activity. They have gone into the war themselves; they have sent their sons into the camps. They have skimped in their food beyond any other class. Generally speaking, they have been thrifty and economical far beyond peace times. They have worked overtime and on holidays without complaint. They have invested their savings in liberty bonds and contributed to war charities to a degree beyond comparison with those more fortunately situated.

Charles M. Schwab, the great ironmaster, who can not be charged with being unduly favorable to labor, will be accepted by the most reactionary as a fair judge. Mr. Schwab took charge of the construction of ships for the Government during the war. In an article in the January, 1919, number of The Nation's Business Mr. Schwab says:

> When I undertook, with my associates, who have been so loyal and so able, the construction of a merchant marine for the United States, I realized that there was just one possibility for success, and that success was not to come about by reason of the shipyards or the engine works or the boiler works, or anything else that we might construct, because that would require time and years of development. It could be brought about in an emergency quickly only by appealing to the best energies and the patriotic endeavor of the citizenship represented by the workmen of the United States. That we succeeded in this undertaking, I am happy to say, has been beyond doubt.

But it is said that labor has been overpaid; that it has profiteered. Let us see. It is true, of course, that there has been an increase in wages, but it is also true that there has been an increase in the cost of living. An increase in income means much to the man of wealth, for he may lay it aside as a saving and use it when normal prices have been restored, where the increase is not all consumed in the added cost of his living. For instance, an increase of $20,000 a year in profits to a manufacturer means $10,000 put aside as a saving if his prior cost of living was $5,000, even though the latter has doubled. But to a workingman whose income is all used up in paying for his living an increase in wages means nothing if there is an accompanying increase in the cost of the things that he must buy. The average workingman is able to save very little. His wages merely represent so much food, clothing, and other necessaries of life for his family. If he is to continue to live on the same scale as before, it is necessary, therefore, that his wages should be increased to the same extent that the cost of the common necessaries of life advances.

Wages, it is true, have been bettered during the war, but the increase has not kept pace with the rise in the cost of living. Translated into terms of food and clothing and other necessaries for his family, the average workman in the United States has received less for his labor during the period of the war than he was getting prior to that time. This statement is no mere assertion on my part. It is supported by the indisputable facts and statistics. I have investigated the matter. I give information which I have drawn from numerous sources upon the subject. In a letter dated December 18, 1918, Mr.

Royal Meeker, Commissioner of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor, makes the following statement:

The changes in union wage scales as a whole per hour and per week in May each year in the United States are indicated by the following index numbers:

	Index rates per hour	Index rates per week.
1907	100	100
1908	101	101
1909	102	102
1910	105	104
1911	107	105
1912	109	107
1913	111	109
1914	114	111
1915	115	112
1916	119	116
1917	127	123
1918	148	142

The index numbers of per capita earnings in the tables relate to earnings, not to wage rates solely. These earnings are affected by overtime and the speeding up of pieceworkers as well as changes in time and piece rates.

Mr. William F. Ogburn, of the National War Labor Board, in a letter dated January 3, 1919, says:

Wages, as measured by wage rates in the building trades, in the printing trades, have not increased probably more than 20 to 30 per cent.

From data recently furnished me by Mr. W. B. Colver, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, I take the following comparison of wages between December, 1914, and December, 1917, for a number of occupations. This includes the first eight months of the war:

Mr. BAER. I understood that for all the wages in the United States the increase is only about 18 per cent. Do you speak of just the mechanics there?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The figures last given refer only to mechanics.

Mr. BAER. Where it is said that certain workingmen are getting from $10 to $15 a day in some plants we know that most families are getting about that much a week, just generally speaking?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It will not do to cite solitary instances. That is not the way to show what wages are all over the United States. It is the usual method of those who wish to exaggerate what labor gets for its toil. But we must take all callings and all conditions into consideration. Men have been taken far away from their homes and into swamps about shipyard works, living at unusual expense, under most uncomfortable and unhealthful conditions, and doing temporary work. Necessarily men working under such conditions must receive beyond what would be the ordinary rate of wages. But to take an instance of that kind and point that out as general wage conditions speaks little for the intelligence of those who use such an argument or less for their desire to be fair.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REED. The great majority of the manufacturers of the country who manufactured war material, you would take it, were not profiteers, but that there were only special cases here and there?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman asks a question that involves a digression, and while I can not undertake to go into it I want to say that in a great majority of cases, if not all of them, there was actual and deliberate profiteering throughout the country on the part of war contractors.

Mr. REED. I want to say that somebody has accused labor of profiteering. Some of these people have taken isolated cases. You have heard of riveters who got $200 a day. Would such a laborer be a profiteer?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would say that $200 a day for a man's personal labor is a most unreasonable figure, and I can not believe it to be true. I can not think it possible.

Mr. REED. The great masses of labor were not paid the compensation that was paid in those isolated cases, I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not approve the man if there was one who got $200 a day. I would heartily condemn the incompetency of the official who made it possible for a man to get such pay. He is the one who is most to blame. While I do not for a moment approve of a mechanic taking more for his services than is fair and right, at the same time I reserve my greatest indignation for the big profiteers from whom our country has suffered on a much larger scale during this war.

I have also collected information from a number of private sources. All of it bears out and verifies the official statistics that I have quoted. It is accurate to say that the letter from the Commissioner of Labor statistics fairly show the wage increase for the period covered. That letter takes 1907 as the base, and shows that where the working man earned $1 in 1907, in 1914 he earned $1.14, and in 1918 he earned $1.48. The increase of 1918 above 1914 is 34 points, which equals 33⅓ per cent. So that from these figures we see that for every $1 a workman earned in 1914 he earned in 1918 $1.33⅓. This represents the increase in wages for the period. From the time we entered the war until the armistice was signed the increase in wages was 21 points—about 20 per cent.

A DAY'S WAGES MUST BE MEASURED BY WHAT IT WILL BUY.

As I have already said, the wages of a laborer must be measured by what it will buy in the way of food, clothing, and the necessaries of life for himself and family. No matter how much he may get in dollars and cents above what he previously received, if the money will not buy more of the necessaries of life that he has to spend it for than before, no increase in pay is shown. This must be clear to everyone.

Judged by this standard not only has labor not profiteered but to the contrary it has made a sacrifice because of the war. Labor is getting less, measured in terms of food and clothing, than was paid as wages in 1914. Instead of there having been an increase in wages there has been an actual decrease. The fact is plain to an unprejudiced observer that the families of laboring men would have actually suffered for the necessaries of life had not war conditions given labor a chance for steady work without loss of time. The workingman's family has been able to live because he has worked steadily during the war and has worked on holidays and after hours, and in this way has been able to earn as much of the necessaries of life as he received prior to the war.

There has been shameless profiteering by certain interests, of course. This has driven the price of the common necessaries of life, such as the masses have to have, very high. The inflation of circulation and supply and demand have also greatly aggravated high prices. The result is that there has been a tremendous increase in prices especially of the common necessaries. In the letter from the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, dated December 18, 1918, to which I have referred, he says of the prices of food:

Taking July, 1914, as the base or 100, retail prices of food in the United States have changed relatively as follows:

July, 1914	100
July, 1915	98
July, 1916	109
July, 1917	143
July, 1918	164
October, 1918	177

In Mr. Ogburn's letter dated January 3, 1919, he makes this statement:

The cost of living has increased about 70 per cent since 1914 pretty generally all over the United States.

I have before me the report of Messrs. Hathaway and Bowen, special statisticians for the Railroad Wage Commission, in which they say:

The increase in the various items of the family budget from January 1, 1916, to January 1, 1918 were ascertained to be:

	Per cent.
Food	52
Clothing	44
Fuel and light	31
Sundries	35

This report was made after an exhaustive inquiry. The Railroad Wage Commission, referring to the investigation, says:

The commission instituted an exhaustive inquiry reaching into all parts of the United States. It sent special agents into various sections of the country to gather original data respecting the existing increase in the cost of living. A canvass was also made by many newspapers of the country among the working classes, and the data thus obtained, together with information gathered and submitted to the commission by those who spoke on behalf of the employees, was compiled by the Bureau of the Census, under the supervision of Special Statisticians W. A. Hathaway and J. C. Bowen. That compilation and the records of the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Labor form the basis of the attached report, wherein the statistical information respecting the existing cost of living in America thus assembled is summarized and analyzed.

Of course, there was a considerable rise in prices between the date of this report and the close of the war.

We see that while there has been an increase of only 33⅓ per cent in wages during the entire war period, from 1914 to 1918, there was during the same period an increase of 77 per cent in the price of food, or, as Mr. Ogburn says, of about 70 per cent in the entire cost of living. The working man who earned $1 in 1914 now earns $1.33⅓. The food for which he paid $1 in 1914 now costs $1.77. The general cost of living which was $1 in 1914 is now $1.70. These are stern figures. They were made up by governmental bureaus, by disinterested statisticians. The matter was investigated by these bureaus to ascertain the facts, not to prove a theory. No honest man can study these figures and still contend that when the armistice was signed labor generally was receiving a greater return than before the war.

But I will perhaps be answered by someone who knows of some particular instance in which a laborer is receiving an undue return for his services. Of course, such instances exist. There are boys who are receiving men's wages, there are unskilled or half-skilled workmen who are getting the pay of skilled men. There are instances in some particular occupation or job of work where there are extraordinary conditions. In some cases men have been taken by their jobs away from their homes and into remote communities where living conditions are bad and extreme discomfort exists or where the work is only temporary and large increases of wages have been given in some of these cases. But such instances are unusual. They are not general to the average workman. They do not affect the vast mass of men who live by the toil of their hands, and such cases can not honestly be cited to support the general charge that labor has been avaricious.

MINERS' WAGES IN THE BIRMINGHAM DISTRICT.

I thought it desirable to make some investigations in my own district because it is fair that we should talk about our own home folks and home conditions while we are talking about conditions that exist the country over.

In the course of my investigations I wrote a letter to Mr. William L. Harrison, president of the Alabama Federation of Labor and an official of the United Mine Workers and thoroughly familiar with labor conditions among coal miners in my own district. I asked Mr. Harrison for a statement upon the subject, believing that conditions among my home people, in whom I feel the deepest interest, would be valuable. In reply to my request Mr. Harrison wrote:

HEADQUARTERS ALABAMA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
December 13, 1918.

HON. GEORGE HUDDLESTON,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 9th instant, and contents carefully noted. In reply will say that I will give you all the information that I have at hand relative to the miners' wages in this district.

I may say that prior to the Garfield agreement there was no uniformity of tonnage prices or day-work prices for mining coal in this district; in fact, there is very little uniformity at the present time.

In the year 1914, and from July of that year, the basic tonnage price in this district was 57½ cents, and daywork prices ranged from $1.50 to $3.50 per day, the major portion of which was from $1.75 to $2 per day. The increases in wages started on February 1, 1916, when tonnage price was advanced from 57½ cents to 60 cents per ton, making a 2½ cents per ton increase. In December, 1916, an advance of 2 cents per ton was received, making the price 62 cents, and on May 1, 1917, an advance of 6 cents per ton, making the price 68 cents; July 1, 1917, an advance of 7 cents per ton, making the mining price 75 cents; November 15, 1917, an advance of 5 cents, making the price 80 cents; and the Garfield agreement, effective May 15, 1918, giving an additional advance of 5 cents per ton, and making the price 85 cents per ton at the present time. I am inclosing copy of the Garfield agreement which shows you the uniform prices for certain classes of daywork that now obtains in the district, also the amount of increase that was given to other classes of labor over and above what was being received prior to May 15. You will observe that the tipple men, which includes all men handling and dumping coal on tipples, received $3 per day. You will observe the drivers inside the mine receive $3.44 per day. Ninety per cent of the men on company work inside the mines are paid on this basis of $3.44 per day. Mine machine runners working by the day receive from $4 to $5 per day.

When iron was selling for $11.50, the maximum price for mining coal was 57½ cents, which was made effective by Judge Gray in his award in 1903. The selling price of iron was made the basis for computing the miners' wages. The mining price increased at the ratio of 2½ cents per ton for every dollar increase in the selling price of iron. Taking that as a basis, iron is now selling at the price fixed by the Government in this district of $32.50, or $21 higher than when the mining price was 57½ cents per ton. At the above ratio the mining price would be $1.10 per ton, but the mining price is only 85 cents per ton.

The prices for run-of-mine coal range from $2.15 per ton for the big seam to $4.25 per ton for the lower seams and seams that are more difficult to mine. The prices of prepared sizes, which is the domestic coal, range from $2.45 to $4.50 per ton. For the year 1910 up until February 1, 1916, when the advances in wages started, the selling price for run-of-mine coal in this district ranged from 85 cents per ton to as high as $1.50. You will observe that the selling price of coal has advanced more than a hundred per cent. You may contrast these figures with those that obtain at the present time and be able to draw some fairly accurate conclusions as to who is profiteering in the mining industry, particularly in this district—the coal operators or the coal miners. Especially when you compare it with the abnormally high cost of living that now obtains over the cost of living that obtained before the war. From the standpoint of the high cost of living, the increases in wages have nothing like kept pace with the increases in the cost of living, and you can readily observe from the figures given above in contrasting the selling price of iron and the selling price of coal that the operators or employers are realizing far greater profits than they ever did in their lives. So far as the wages of the coal miners in this district are concerned, they are far below the basic wages of the coal miners of the rest of the country.

Yours, very truly,

WM. L. HARRISON, President.

So that while the wages of coal miners in the Birmingham district have been increased a total of only 47 per cent they have spent their wages for necessaries of life which have increased 70 per cent, and meanwhile their employers' prices for coal have advanced an average of over 100 per cent, and for iron about 300 per cent.

FEWER STRIKES DURING THE WAR.

Labor can not profiteer without friction, and labor troubles are a good index either of the employers' effort to reduce wages or of the workingman's effort to increase his wages. Having this in mind, I have made investigations as to labor troubles during the war period. On that subject, under date of December 28, 1918, I received a letter from the Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor which states that for the period from January 1 to October 31, 1916—before the war—there were 2,796 strikes in the United States, and that from January 1 to November 11, 1918—the heart of the war period—there were only 2,540 strikes. So that for a longer period in 1918 during the war there were 256 fewer strikes than in 1916. Also the information was given that the strikes for the 1918 period lasted only an average of 16½ days, while the average for the 1916 period was 22 days.

And I should also like to call attention to the fact that this period of fewer strikes occurred at the time when labor was under the greatest pressure on account of the rapidly advancing cost of living, an advance that the increase in their wages did not near keep up with. Notwithstanding that fact and a greatly increased pressure on account of the shortage in labor and the opportunity that labor had, if it only chose to do it, to go out and get whatever wages it chose to demand—notwithstanding these facts, labor accepted inadequate wages, and there was not nearly so much loss of time from strikes as occurred during peace times.

These figures further establish the fact that labor has not only made its sacrifices but has made them willingly and without resentment; that labor has appreciated the fact that the war was to be won at home, in the workshop, on the farms, and wherever there was work for men's hands to do, no less than on the firing line in France. So that we find that the workingman has toiled long hours, has given up his holidays, has restrained his desire for better conditions and fairer treatment, and has accepted for his labor a smaller return in the things that he spends his money for than before the war times. This is a splendid record. It is one to which every worker may point with pride and satisfaction. It challenges the admiration of every class and citizen. Surely, no fair-minded man would take from the humble toiler the credit that is justly due him for his splendid and patriotic spirit.

There has been profiteering out of the war. Alas, that is too true, and the country has suffered from it. It has been hindered in carrying on the war. It has been made less efficient. Our blows upon the faces of our enemies have been weakened by it. The advance of our brave boys has been retarded, all by the shameless avarice of men seeking to make money out of the war. They have succeeded in making money. They have heaped up their millions in unjust and extortionate profits, and now I fear that the profiteers are going to be allowed to get away with a good part of their gains. I fear their loot is not going to be taxed out of them, as I have advocated all the while.

They are going to be permitted to lay it away, and we shall never be able to get at it any more after this tax year.

I may say further, that this propaganda against labor—and I want to be fair even to the profiteers—this propaganda against labor comes from those who have made millions out of the war. It is financed and is carried on by them for a deliberate purpose, namely, to distract attention from their own iniquity and place the blame on labor for any friction that may occur hereafter.

It illy becomes them to point the accusing finger at the sweating toilers of the land and seek to distract attention from their own misconduct by lying insinuations and selfish propaganda.

There has been profiteering. It is only too true. Profiteering in food, in lumber, in iron, in coal, in the necessaries of life, in war supplies—everywhere that greed found its opportunity. I have repeatedly called attention to this profiteering in my speeches in the House. By exposing the profiteers I have won the bitter enmity of such of them as operate in my own district, and they have not hesitated to show their hatred. But I remain unafraid. Truth needs no apology. Honesty of purpose requires no defense. Devotion to the public welfare is its own shield.

LET US BE FAIR.

I greatly fear that the lying propaganda against labor shows the purpose to beat down wages without regard to the cost of living—that it anticipates labor troubles, strikes and disorder, which it is expected will result from the contemplated measures. Of course, there will be labor strikes if wages are reduced while the cost of living soars. Naturally the laborer will resist the reduction of his wages below what he can live decently on. If that is what the propagandists contemplate, then, of course, there will be trouble. I hope there will be no such trouble. I trust that the workingman and the employer will each proceed with due regard to the rights of the other, and that industry in our country may go on in a regular way along the lines of peace-time progress.

But if there is to be trouble, let it not come in an artificial atmosphere charged with false public opinion molded by selfish interests for their own purposes. If there is to be friction between employer and worker, let us be fair to both. Let not the case of either be prejudiced in advance by the sinister propaganda of his adversary. The public should bear in mind labor's splendid war record, and in the interest of right should give its unprejudiced sympathy and support in any labor controversy to that side which has its position based on justice. The workers are poor. They are, in the main, unorganized and weak. They can not bring powerful influences to bear upon public opinion. We must be careful to see that they are heard and their arguments fairly considered. It is with the view to do justice to labor and to present these facts to you, gentlemen, who are before me and to the public of the United States that I have made these remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask leave to extend and revise my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAGSDALE). The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is my purpose to-day to make some observations upon the great subject which is now pending before the world for settlement.

In attempting to reach a correct conclusion as to what should be done toward the proposition to establish a league of nations for the maintenance of the world peace there are a number of facts of primary importance, a correct understanding of which should help us. The first and most important is that government is a creature of development. As necessity has required, government has developed, not in a haphazard sort of way but under clearly defined laws, extending its scope from the individual family to the tribe, from the tribe to the principality, from the principality to the petty kingdom, from the petty kingdom to the great nations, and from the great nations to the loosely constructed and weakly constituted international government, in which government, for years past, custom has been crystallizing into a sort of international common law, which constitutes most of what has become designated as international law.

Not only has government progressed in that direction, but as we look back we see government beginning with a strong man, with the power of life and death in his hands, and through the exercise of that power he welds warring, disorganized elements into government. Tyranny is a bad thing in the abstract, but tyranny and oppression have stimulated the people to think upon the wrongs inflicted by government, and as they have thought they have acquired ability to participate in government; and as they have acquired ability to participate in government they have taken into their own hands the power to govern.

Up through the process of the ages we have come to the point where the peoples in the dominant nations of the earth have taken control of government. That is an important fact to consider. There could never have been hope for world peace which rested upon a contract made among kings. Not only is it true that the people have come into control, but out of the mire and murk of deceptions which have characterized the world's diplomacy there has grown an international conscience. This is the general preparation of the world with which it confronts the stupendous problem of organizing the world's governments for the preservation of the world's peace.

It is clear that the next step in this series of progressions, whenever it shall come, will be in that direction which will give substance to this shadow of world government which we have now, that it may finally exercise authoritative jurisdiction over many of those matters which have been provocative of war and may extend international protection to those peoples who may be illegally imperiled. How far we are from the consummation of this government it would be profitless to speculate.

The fact is there is a wide latitude in which there may be freedom of human action and in which there is definite, independent human responsibility.

But in so far as the big outlines of world movement are concerned, they do not depend upon the independent will of men. What men are to do is suggested to them by necessity. With one hand necessity points the way; with the other it wields the lash. That fact must not be forgotten in dealing with this matter.

That there is need of such a government for the world no one will question. The only question is whether or not we have reached the point in world development and have reached the point in world necessity which make this the proper and feasible time to begin the formation of such government.

Mr. Chairman, it is idle to dream of national disarmament until there exists some sort of international police force. In the communities the private citizenship did not disarm until there was a constabulary to carry arms for the community.

Until there is some tribunal to which an imperiled country may go for protection or an aggrieved country may go for redress it is absurd to imagine that wars have ceased. In the communities of the world violence of this character did not cease until governments were established in which peaceable adjustment was made possible and to which appeal could be made for protection against the vicious.

We have just emerged from the most destructive conflict ever waged among men. This conflict grew out of international differences or was inspired by the selfish ambition of one man or of a group of men; it matters not.

This conflict and its consequences differ only in degree from the conflicts that in former days occurred between tribes or principalities, which, after years of bloodshed, discovered that it was possible to heal their disorders by the establishment of a government dealing with the causes over which they had previously fought, a government which had the power to adjust the cause of their conflicts and to restrain the vicious who had disturbed the peace of the community.

When another such war is to come to the earth is, of course, a mere matter of speculation; but that wars are to recur among nations, until there be a government established to adjust the differences which arise among nations, is absolutely certain.

It would be just as reasonable to abolish our courts and dismiss our police forces and expect peace and safety in our communities as it would be to expect peace and safety in the greater international community where there are no courts and where there is no police force.

In determining what we shall do with regard to this intensely practical matter we must not be guided by any untried theories or depend upon the existence of any controlling virtue among the nations which we do not find controlling within the nations.

It would be equally disastrous to reject, in reaching our conclusions, the guidance of those fundamental principles which up to this time have shaped the course of men's activities in governmental development.

If an international government is to be attained, it must be reached by the same road by which the nations of men have reached intranational government. The constituents of the international world are the same sort of human beings who constitute the nations of the world and will require for international control the application of the same governmental principles that are essential to national control.

While there are certain characteristics common to men, there are vast differences, racial and otherwise, among the nations of men. In government we find some have advanced far, while others are in the kindergarten of national government, not yet having demonstrated the ability to establish a free and orderly government among themselves. We must entertain no foolish delusions as to the place which these peoples must occupy under any world government.

To give to any nation suffrage in a world government the free suffrage of whose citizenship does not control its national affairs would incorporate in such world government an element of weakness and of danger, with regard to which we are warned by the lessons of history and the dictates of our own caution and sound judgment.

This is one of the points at which the greatest difficulty will be encountered, but it can be met just as the nations have met the same difficulty. It is sufficient to know that the mere fact that there are some nations unfitted for full share of responsibility in world government is not even persuasive that we are unready to begin the establishment of such government. In our own scheme of government the recognition of the existence of this unfitness is found and provided for. Note our Indian policy, our Philippine and general insular possessions policy. But to such of our people definitely grouped we extend the benefit of our institutions and hold about them the arms of our protection, and that must be the attitude toward those who may become the wards of the world.

Mr. Speaker, if the people who constitute any democratic government had waited until all to be admitted to full citizenship were fitted for full participation in such government the government would not have been established. It is quite clear that in the beginning only a small part of the citizenship—with but few exceptions, perhaps only the leaders—are qualified by both character and mental attainment, and some leaders not qualified.

It is only necessary for the successful maintenance of a government that the masses admitted to citizenship be fitted by character and native ability and consent to the general plan of the government. While experience has demonstrated the wisdom of excluding the unfit when they can be definitely grouped or classified and the necessity of preventing the incorporation of a percentage of the unfit large enough to constitute a balance of power between rival political organizations seeking governmental control, we must not lose sight of the fact that it is only after years of participation under the guidance of leadership that the independent judgment of the masses may control. The fact is that mass development never overtakes the progressive intricacies and difficulty in government.

So, I say, the fact that there are peoples unprepared to share equal responsibility in world government or unprepared to share responsibility at all is not even persuasive that we are unready to begin the establishment of such government. Let us come now to a closer consideration of the subject.

There is no question that the recent war has tremendously impressed the world with the need of a better method for settling international differences and a better method of world protection than that which we have recently been compelled to resort.

We are now confronted with the necessity of making a choice between two methods, and in choosing we must balance the objections to, the dangers from, and the virtues of one against the objections to, the dangers from, and the virtues of the other.

It would be difficult to conceive of a plan for world government under which there could develop greater peril, greater suffering, and greater destruction than has developed during the past four years under the present plan. And it must be conceded that the present plan does not incorporate even the possibility of protection against a repetition of the experience of the past four years.

I am not foolish enough to imagine that an international government could be now formed which would forever banish war or prevent international violence; but that would be the immediate tendency of a definite movement in the formation of such a government, and at some point in the years to come conflicts among the nations would cease.

We may not be able at this present time to establish a government of the world or even a government for the world. How long in the economy of things that task, unfinished, is to challenge to higher levels of efficiency the heart and mind of the world I have no guess. That is not our business. Our business is to begin and to work earnestly through our day. We may not be able at this time to do more than associate the allies into a sort of world vigilance committee for regulation and protection in the general community of the nations. This would not be an unusual preliminary to organized governmental establishment; and just as an organized vigilance committee is an improvement upon anarchy, organized government is an improvement upon the vigilance committee and follows it in the course of progress. Other nations should be permitted to join this group, if it shall constitute the nucleus—and clearly it should—and share power with it, but they should not be permitted to join this group until they join in its purposes and policies and share in its ideals. We must not wreck the great possibilities of the present by an overload of dead weight which at any time may add to the burden of its carriage the peril of its positive antagonism. But it must be the purpose and the policy of this group, now in world ascendency, to welcome into full international citizenship every nation fitted in a substantial degree for the responsibilities of such citizenship and to guide the other nations, yet unqualified, toward such qualification.

Mr. Chairman, we should not be disturbed by the fact that the contemplation of the formation of such a government discloses the presence of great difficulties. Difficulties are everywhere. They constitute in the scheme of life the gymnastic paraphernalia necessary for human development. The history of the world is the record of difficulties overcome. The world's greatest epochs are those times when the races of men, with courage and high purpose, have struggled through the world's greatest difficulties to victorious conclusions.

This is one of those rare but clearly defined times in the world's history when the current of world movement runs deep and swiftly. Everywhere it is felt and known. Everywhere there is indisputable evidence that this is the natal day of a great epoch which has been coming to birth through the travail of the world.

As we contemplate the situation we ask ourselves what great difficulty overcome shall mark the time; what task is at hand to challenge to greater genius the world's statesmanship, to give to its patriotism new strength; what act, what achievement shall conserve and keep for the world that which the blood and treasure of the world has bought; toward what objective turns the quickened spirit of the world? Can there be any question as to the answer?

What sort of an epoch is this to be? As we look about us we find neither prospect of nor need of greater progress in the realms of the arts of sciences, discovery, or invention. We see that progress in things purely material has for a long time been moving under unprecedented momentum.

It is true that we have already brought a great military task to successful accomplishment. But this can not make an epoch. Primarily that task, viewed apart from its influence upon the successful actors therein, was not creative nor constructive. It did not advance; it was protective and preventive and preparatory merely. We fought not to gain, not to advance, but to preserve, to hold that which the world had gained through the ages past. In man power, in industrial resources the world has gone backward during this struggle. In complexity its problems have increased. We face the new year with much of the world in industrial and political chaos. If a great advancement shall mark this time, that advancement is yet to come. What task is at hand? For what definite thing has the work of the past four years tended to fit the dominant nations of the world?

As we look particularly at our own Nation we see that the policy of nonentangling alliances, which has been as distinctive and as fundamental with us as our Constitution, and which has held us to a continental sphere of primary influence, has yielded under the pressure of recent events, the preference of any of us or of all of us to the contrary notwithstanding. Whether we would have it so or not, it is a fact that to-day we sit in the council of the world the most potential of the world's powers, dealing with the world's most stupendous problems. Into what involvements we are yet to be drawn no human mind can forecast; but it is evident that we are not now to withdraw from the responsibility which has come to us. There is no suggestion from any respected source that we should now attempt to withdraw.

It is an interesting and an important fact, as I view it, that these responsibilities are not ours by independent choice. Our position in the world to-day is due to no voluntary abandonment of our traditional policy with reference to international entanglements, which policy was contemporaneous in adoption with the formation of the Republic. Our disposition to adhere to that policy is fully attested by the fact that it alone held us from the conflict when the blood of the Nation was hot with indignation. It held us while the months passed into years, and every instinct of a chivalrous people impelled us toward the conflict.

We did not by the act of entry into this war, with the allies as our associates, even for the time technically abandon this policy. Overt acts of war against us as a Nation prior to our entry were committed.

Our present position, therefore, is due to no change in our national policy which we have willed to make. We were caught in the grip of the rising tide of war and torn from the strongest moorings which has ever held a nation within a fixed policy. Our will to remain where we were could not hold us there. There is no will to return which can carry us back. How it happened we may speculate, but the fact is the strength which we had gained on the Western Continent, protected by our isolation and a wise national policy, had fitted us for world service, and in some way into the service of the world we have been carried.

I do not want to appear as a dreamer or as a theorist or as a fatalist, and I believe that I do not evidence that by the assertion of the clearest fact of history, that in so far as the big outlines of world policy are concerned no generation can choose its work. The general direction of the movement of an age comes not from the independent choice of the actors within that age. A given nation may destroy itself by steering its policy against the current moving under the impulse of infinite purpose, and a nation, by reason of its position of leadership and power, may even halt the current, but only long enough for the standard of leadership to be transferred to other hands. History leaves no doubt as to the truth of that statement. And, in the light of the record left by the nations of men, there can be no doubt as to what would have been our fate as a Nation if we had failed at this world crisis.

Destiny—that destiny which apportions to each generation its task—does not ask us to choose; it commands us to act. Oh, we have a choice, just the same sort of choice that we have between obeying the laws of our country or violating them and going to the penitentiary; just the same sort of choice I had as a boy between obeying my parents or disobeying them and receiving a chastisement. A man who lives in the Tropics is not forced to screen his house; if he prefers to have yellow fever it is his privilege to have it. The people of a community are not compelled to provide themselves with an organized government with the power to protect, to adjust, to punish; if they prefer they may have anarchy and violence, but the only way to avoid anarchy is to establish and maintain a government. Anarchy and violence is the lash of destiny driving the races of men toward the establishment of effective governmental authority through which larger and larger groups may be brought into unity of effort.

Aside from the danger resulting from conflicting national and personal ambitions, which has always been a peril to peace, there has come a new complexity and a new danger from the inventions and discoveries of the past two generations and from our own generation.

These inventions and discoveries have eliminated distance, destroyed national self-sufficiency, increased the effectiveness of instrumentalities of destruction, and, by overlapping and entangling national economic and governmental interests, have made imperative the necessity of establishing some tribunal for the adjudication of disputes growing out of this complicated relationship. At the same time these inventions and discoveries facilitate such establishment.

In no community of the world, large or small, have the generations of man been able to devise any method for the preservation of peace, for the orderly adjustment of differences, than through some kind of governmental machinery combining justice and force. Justice without force is impotent. Force without justice is destructive. Where law does not obtain, anarchy may manifest itself at any time.

As we look at the international situation, with the conflicting interests obtaining there—industrial, racial, conflicts of ambition—we find that there is not in the midst of all this peril a single tribunal to which an aggrieved nation may go for redress nor an imperiled nation for protection.

We talk of international law, but as law is commonly understood there is no such thing as international law; no more than there could be, in a popular sense, intranational law without a national government to enforce it. We tried that ridiculous experiment at The Hague. We turned our backs upon the lesson of history; we dismissed from our council our own common sense and closed our eyes to the daily demonstrations in our various governments that right devoid of power is impotent to restrain the vicious. We know the peril which the absence of international government imposed, but we cowered before the difficulties incident to its establishment. That is the danger now. That Hague experiment grew out of our realization of the danger, and we paid for the folly, for the failure to provide that which our actions demonstrated we knew was needed; we paid by the most destructive war that has ever come to the earth. We will pay again if we permit all this sacrifice to be for naught; we will pay again with blood and with treasure, and we will pay with the loss of world leadership, and maybe with the loss of national liberty. Never in the history of the world did a great nation fail in a great crisis and retain its greatness.

Instructed by the experience of men in the realm of government, humbled by the sense of our responsibility, conscious of the difficulties which interpose and of the dangers which must be avoided, with a purpose so unselfish that we may trust to a divine guidance, with that sublime courage which has won for us national leadership, it is ours by the clearest imaginable designation to lead the world toward the establishment of peace by extending authoritative government into that unoccupied realm of conflicting interest, that "no man's land" which lies between the governments of the world, that breeding place of the world's wars.

With this achievement we shall crown the greatest of the world's epochs. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. HICKS was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I regret that there are not more Members present at this time, not because of anything that I may say myself, but because I have two letters from soldiers just returned from the front, in which I am satisfied every Member of the House, if he were present, would be deeply interested.

I shall spend no time in advance with reference to them, except to say that they are written by members of the famous One hundred and sixty-eighth Regiment, a part of the equally famous Forty-second Division, soldiers who have been wounded and have been returned to Camp Dodge, Iowa. I read now as follows:

DES MOINES, IOWA, January 16, 1919.

Congressman GREEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As we are soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces, and just returned from France wounded, and about to be mustered out of service, I would like to call to your attention this most needable favor from you, as we are some boys from Iowa. This favor is as follows:

First of all is where we stand, up until this date, is about six months' pay coming at the least to the majority of us.

Second. We have old clothes that we came from France with, and all patched up, not worth while giving away, which we are supposed to be mustered out of service with.

Third. Some of us have no money in the banks at home to buy new civilian clothes with.

Fourth. The clothes sold in camps for soldiers is way above cost, as it would take our whole six months' pay to buy only a suit.

Fifth. We all as soldiers, indeed, think that we at least can be given a good and worthy suit to go home with after being in France and away from home so long, to approach our mothers and sweethearts with clothes all patched up and don't fit; a good army, as we are, should wear good clothes; our appearance shows our standard.

We are writing to you, as we are in need of your help and think you'll be the one to help the boys of the American Expeditionary Forces, as we are actually in distress and helpless.

I read also from the other letter, omitting some matter personal to myself:

CAMP DODGE, IOWA, January 16, 1919.

Congressman GREEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GREEN: I take it upon my shoulders to tell you about the boys who gave up everything in home life to go to the colors at the first call for men. These boys are from the One hundred and sixty-eighth Infantry and have been wounded, and are the advance guard of what is left of the old outfit; and, as you probably know, there are very few left. But we who are left feel that we are entitled to at least a decent uniform to go home in to greet our mothers, fathers, sisters, and sweethearts, as the uniforms that we are wearing now are the same that we were issued in France, and are in terrible condition from the effects of the sterilizers that they have been put through. They are so full of holes and so wrinkled that they do not resemble a uniform in any manner, shape, or form, but like a gunny sack. Now, if that is the way that Uncle Sam welcomes his soldiers home, why, all right; but do you think it fair and square? The boys who are located here permanently at the camp can get anything in the shape of clothes that they desire, while we can get nothing but abuse. Now, I am not crabbing, but just telling you something that you should know of. When the boys have asked for clothes they were told that we could buy them at the Q. M. exchange or at clothing stores in Des Moines.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GREEN OF Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I received a letter from a young man last week who enlisted in the service last July. This letter was written in France on December 15, and he said he had not received one cent of pay from the Government since he enlisted in the service. Now, how are the boys going to buy clothes when they are not getting their pay?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is what these young men say, that most of them have not had any pay for six months. I do not know why it is that the War Department insists that they are receiving their pay. I am satisfied that these boys are not misrepresenting the situation in relation to their pay. If they were getting their money, they would be glad of it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I feel sure that this boy to whom I refer would not misrepresent the facts, for I know him pretty well.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This young man asks:

Now, how is a fellow going to buy a uniform when we haven't been paid for eight months; and, then, why should we have to buy our own uniforms? If we were officers it would be different, but we are enlisted men.

I intend to go home in overalls, so do some of the rest. Three of us live in Council Bluffs.

The remainder of the letter is personal to myself, and I omit it for that reason.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I submit that this condition of affairs is a disgrace to our great country. Here are men who have fought in the trenches, who have slept in the mud and mire, men who have gone over the top at Chateau-Thierry and St. Mihiel and other places, who have received their baptism of fire time and again, who have withstood shot and shell. They have been beset by machine guns; they have come home, finally, wounded and in tattered uniforms. They can not make themselves presentable at home. That such a condition should obtain is simply a disgrace to this great country.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Do I understand that enlisted men have been required to buy uniforms?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If they get two uniforms, they are required to buy them. These men have their old uniforms, which they wore in their campaigns in France. These uniforms have been put through sterilizing machines. These boys have climbed through barbed wire with them, and they have gone through machine-gun fire. They are tattered, torn, worn, and out of shape.

Mr. EMERSON. They have not been given any other uniforms?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They have not been given any other uniforms. That is the condition. I present it to the House in the hope that some action may be taken.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How long have the troops in that camp been here?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not say how long they have been on this side. The gentleman is aware that the Rainbow Division went over a year ago last fall.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What explanation has the gentleman ever heard for the nonpayment of the boys?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There can be no excuse for nonpayment; it is impossible that such a condition of affairs should be excused.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What explanation has been given?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The explanation that has been given is that the men went to the hospital and they could not find them to pay them. I can not see that that is any excuse at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are not the records of the men taken to the hospital?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They should be; but I will say that I have tried to find men over there in the hospitals and have tried to get mail to them, but for some reason or other I could not get any mail to them. I had a letter to-day from a lady who said that she knew her son had altogether as many as 200 letters over there. He had been there a year or more and not one had ever reached him. He has been in the hospital, and he wrote home, "Why don't you write; why can not I hear from you?" He gets no mail and he gets no pay, and he is to be sent home in tattered clothing and told to go out and shift for himself. He has no money to get a new suit.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As far as the clothes are concerned, he can not have anything on that would confer greater honor on him than his old suit; but he ought to have his back pay, and I can not understand what excuse can be given for not paying him. I have two such cases myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. EMERSON. Has the gentleman made any investigation as to why the letters to soldiers are not forwarded to hospitals where they are wounded. I wrote to my son last August, and four or five weeks ago the letter came back to me, and on the envelope was stamped "Wounded, at some place in France." Why could not they have forwarded the letter to that place? I have received letters from him from that place.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The whole matter is unexplainable and I can not understand it. Resolutions have been introduced for an investigation, but, as the committees now stand, that will not be permitted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have been informed just now by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that the Secretary of War informed him that the commanding officer will pay these men all the money that is due them upon their affidavit being filed. Does the gentleman from Iowa know anything about that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I had not heard of that. I am glad the War Department is getting some action. I did intend to mention another matter, and that is that for some reason or other the records have not been following them to the hospitals and consequently the commanding officer did not have at the hospital sufficient records to determine the exact amount of pay due to the soldier. That is one reason why they were not paid. But the gentleman suggests a way that this might be corrected. I am glad to say that what has occurred in the House has aroused the War Department and the Government in this matter, and also with reference to the discharged soldiers. I suppose the department was not fully aware of the condition of things.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I had a letter from a soldier at Camp Shelby, Miss., who has not had his back pay for five consecutive months. He is in perfect health; the records are there; he is answering the roll call every day.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman knows that it is not the fault of Congress. We have voted the money, and it is there in the appropriate place to pay them. In the case the gentleman mentions it is absolutely inexcusable. I trust that the War Department will give attention to these cases and not simply make a public statement that the men are paid, when they are not paid.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. May I inquire if the gentleman from Iowa has taken up with the War Department one of these cases?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I have not taken up the cases of the young men who wrote these letters; they did not sign them.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Iowa has not taken up the question of back pay with the War Department?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not at all; but I heard of an instance the other day where a private was called up before the officer and told that if he undertook to have the matter investigated and looked into by Congress, he would be severely disciplined.

Mr. WELLING. Did the gentleman from Iowa announce that the letters he read were anonymous letters?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They are anonymous; but I can find out who they are, for I know where they live. They do not sign their names, and I think they have good reason for that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would say that Gen. Lord, who has charge of the entire pay department of the Army, was before the Military Committee and made a statement in which he went into a detailed explanation of the matter which the gentleman has just discussed, and it will appear in the printed hearings. In a general way it was that the men in this country have been paid promptly, as promptly as they were in the time of peace; that there was no real amount of complaint for nonpayment in any of the camps here.

Those men who were not paid in Europe, of whom we have heard so much, were paid here, upon the filing of an affidavit. The minute that the department discovered these men were coming back, some of them without pay because of the fact that their records were not complete, every officer was instructed, upon the statement of the soldier of the amount due him, and his affidavit, to immediately pay the soldier that amount.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wish that Gen. Lord would better inform himself as to the facts.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the integrity of the gentleman's letter——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. With reference to the integrity of the letter, I noticed the statement that it takes six months' pay to buy a suit of clothes. I do not believe that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware that the man is not speaking of the amount of pay, except as to what he could save out of it in that time.

Mr. GARNER. He did not put it in that way. He said it took six months' pay to buy one suit of clothes at the prices they were selling; that they were selling the clothes higher than the cost. That would be $180, and I do not believe it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think the gentleman ought to indulge in that kind of an insinuation. He knows the ordinary private in writing a letter of this kind would not be as exact as a lawyer. He ought to be able to understand that fair meaning of that letter. A soldier going into civil life would have to buy a complete outfit.

Mr. GARNER. I put a fair interpretation upon it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me as if there were a great many soldiers in Europe who have not received any pay since they have been in the service.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Many on this side also.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It is all well and good for the War Department to say that they pay them as soon as they get home. They do not need the money over here as much as they do over there. They have no home or friends over there, and are there without a dollar in their pockets. It seems to me the War Department ought to pay those boys who have come from good homes; who have always had money in their pockets; who are over there five or six months at a time without any money to spend. The parents can not send the money to them because the letters do not reach them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has stated the situation correctly, except that the same situation exists on this side, as the gentleman from Michigan has recently stated.

Mr. GARNER. Who is responsible for the payment of the men in France?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The War Department.

Mr. GARNER. What does the gentleman mean by the War Department? Is Gen. Pershing responsible? He is at the head of the War Department in France.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He is not in charge of the paymaster's division there.

Mr. GARNER. He is in charge of the Paymaster Corps over there, is he not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In one way, yes; and the gentleman knows all about those matters. He does not need to question me about them.

Mr. CURRY of California. The Secretary of War is in charge of Gen. Pershing, is he not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CURRY of California. Why is it necessary for these men to make an affidavit that they have served in the Army, when they have been drafted from private life, put into the Army, sent across, and have fought our battles in Europe? What kind of a record establishment have we got in the War Department? I have complaints of that kind myself; and in reference to the proposition of the sick, I have a letter in my office on my desk from the War Department telling me to take the matter up with the Red Cross, that they have better records than has the War Department.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just a moment. In regard to the suggestion that you should take the matter up with the Red Cross, after you do so you are informed that the orders from the War Department are that the Red Cross can not give you the information.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I was about to call attention to that, that communications of that sort from the Red Cross, referred to them by the War Department, inform me that they—the Red Cross—have orders from the War Department not to give me that information.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The affidavit of the soldier is as to the date of his last payment, not as to his being in the Army; simply an affidavit as to the amount due him.

Mr. CURRY of California. Would the gentleman from Nebraska require one of his employees to make an affidavit as to when he was paid last before he would give him his wages?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In this case, the records upon which these men are to be paid are in Europe, and the man comes here without the record. There is no other way of knowing what is due him.

Mr. CURRY of California. The soldier is not supposed to bring his record with him.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; but it should have been sent with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Wisconsin any more time that he desires to consume?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think that completes it. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 30 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia 58 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Those 30 minutes were reserved for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Dr. TEMPLE, but I understand the gentleman does not wish to occupy them.

Mr. FLOOD. I had some reserved for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] but he is not here.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I reserve mine until to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, let us read.

Mr. FLOOD. Let us read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES OF AMBASSADORS AND MINISTERS.

Ambassadors extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Austria-Hungary, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Spain, and Turkey, at $17,500 each, $227,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I believe the committee has added Turkey to the ambassadorial list to receive the highest salary paid ambassadors. I was not here during the entire discussion when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] pointed out the need of having ambassadors at different countries than those designated in the bill. I rise now to inquire what is the policy of the committee, for instance, in providing for envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Bulgaria, Roumania, and Serbia, when in the last bill we only had one envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to those three countries? We all know that the map of Europe is going to be rearranged very shortly. There will be need of diplomatic representatives to German Austria, Jugo-Slavia, Czecho-Slavia, and any States that are going to be created as the result of the peace conference. Now, I desire to ascertain the viewpoint of the chairman, as expressing the view of the committee, as to whether they thought it was advisable to defer the appointment of these additional ambassadors until it was actually ascertained by peace negotiations. If that is the fact, why is the committee, in a measure, providing for representatives to some of those countries?

Mr. FLOOD. The policy of the committee is to provide ambassadors and ministers to countries whenever the executive department of the Government recognizes the ambassadors and ministers from those countries. The cases of Bulgaria, Serbia, and Roumania are different from other cases cited by the gentleman in that our country has recognized those countries for years and have received their representatives. The territorial limits of Serbia will probably be very much changed, but there is a Serbian Government which has been recognized by our Government, and it does not make any difference so far as this item is concerned whether she is made larger or not; Roumania is recognized by our Government and so is the Bulgarian Government.

It is impossible under the conditions existing in those countries to have one minister accredited to those countries at this time, and we have received ministers from those countries, and the Executive will appoint ministers to them as soon as the appropriation is made. With reference to the other countries the policy of our committee is to wait until the peace conference has determined the existence of those countries and their territorial limits and our Government has recognized them as existing countries before it recommends appropriations for the Diplomatic Service there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Am I correct in my recollection that Turkey did not have the highest rank of ambassador as carried in the last Diplomatic appropriation bill?

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is not right about that. Turkey has had an ambassador for some years. We had an ambassador to Turkey for a number of years. Of course, since Turkey ceased diplomatic relations with us we have had no ambassador there.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not a fact that this paragraph is identical with the paragraph of the preceding Diplomatic and Consular bill of last year?

Mr. FLOOD. The one about ambassadors, exactly the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wished to obtain the viewpoint of the committee as to what their policy is as to representatives for the newly created countries of Europe to be created at the peace conference. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if an appropriation should be made for an ambassador to Austria-Hungary in view of the fact that Austria-Hungary has ceased to exist. By the recognition of the Czecho-Slovaks Austria-Hungary has completely ceased to exist as a country.

Mr. FLOOD. We have no official information to that effect. We are making appropriations for this ambassador just as we made it when we were at war with Austria-Hungary. We made the appropriation, but no ambassador was sent to that country.

Mr. LONDON. I understand the situation has radically changed and that as a fact Austria-Hungary does not exist to-day. Germany does, but Austria-Hungary does not.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, officially, we do not know that fact; it has not been communicated to the Congress.

Mr. LONDON. The State Department has recognized the Czecho-Slovaks.

Mr. FLOOD. We have not given them full recognition. We have no representative from that country here and have accredited no representative to that country.

Mr. LONDON. I did not quite get the reply of the gentleman from Virginia to the query about providing an appropriation for ambassadors or envoys to the countries which are to be carved out of the now existing central countries.

Mr. FLOOD. As soon as those countries are established and recognized by our Government, appropriations will be made to pay our representatives to those countries. The executive department of the Government will accredit representatives to them, and we will make appropriations to pay them and pay their expenses.

Mr. LONDON. There is no general appropriation anywhere to enable the Department of State to make appointments?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer on page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LITTLE: Page 2, line 5, after the word "Spain," strike out the words "and Turkey," and after "each" strike out "$227,500" and insert "$210,000."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, my purpose is, a little farther down in the list of $10,000 ministers, to insert "Turkey." I can not understand any justification for maintaining an embassy for the next two years in the ex-Empire of Turkey at $17,500 a year. There will be probably a nation of Turkey left, but if it gets a minister at $10,000 a year it will be treated like similar nations, and even stronger and bigger nations are. It will not be any injustice to us even now if it is reduced to such a grade as it was before. It is not one of the great empires of the world, anyway. Seventeen thousand five hundred dollars was probably always too much for its merits. I am not asking that anything be done to this at all except that it be placed in the rank of other nations of similar importance, just as it stands and has stood. But if, as we all anticipate, Turkey is moved into Asia, we shall feel ourselves then more than justified. I can not conceive why the ambassador to a country like that should be given the same salary as one who goes to London. There should be no such expense. It looks like an effort to encourage Turkey along the line of bad conduct, and we should not be doing anything to put a premium on the bad conduct of the Turks. What will the Christian Armenians, who fought for you, think when a gilded ambassador goes to Constantinople and the shrines of 1,500 years of Christians are forgotten? Ten thousand dollars a year is enough.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, our legation to Turkey was raised to an ambassadorship by act of Congress, and Congress has not seen fit to reduce it, and it does not seem to me it would be at all wise to take such action in this irregular way. If the gentleman desires to reduce our mission to Turkey from the position which it now occupies, he ought to introduce a bill in Congress and let it pass, repealing the existing law. No ambassador has been accredited to Turkey since Turkey broke off diplomatic relations with us immediately after we declared war against Germany. We have not a representative there, and we have not had a representative there. But our law provides at this time for an ambassador to Turkey, and the salary for an ambassador is $17,500, and we are carrying that in this bill now just as we carried it at the time we were at war with the allies of Turkey. There is a regular way to do this thing, and when the conditions in Europe are adjusted, when the peace conference has fixed the boundaries of the different nations, the old nations, and the new nations that will be created in Europe, then the executive department of our Government can determine the class of representatives they propose to have in these different countries, and if Congress approves of that determination they will be fixed by law. But now there is no reason why the provision to which the gentleman objects should not go in this bill. It does not give any particular prestige to Turkey any more than it gave at the time we were at war with Turkey's allies.

Mr. LITTLE. It does not interfere with the matter. But this country has the right to give or appropriate any salary it wants to, and can cut it to $1,000 a year if it wants to. There are many reasons why we should reduce this fellow's salary to $10,000. It ought to be reduced a good deal further. Suppose we call him an ambassador, and give him the right to wear all the furbelows he wants to wear, let us show definitely that we want to save money.

Mr. FLOOD. There is no ambassador at all.

Mr. LITTLE. Then there is no occasion to appropriate anything, and no harm can be done by cutting it to $10,000.

Mr. FLOOD. It will be much more in accordance with the proprieties of the situation to strike it out altogether.

Mr. LITTLE. Very well. The gentleman keeps telling us what the Executive would do. The executive department will think about it as Congress thinks about it, and if we will indicate what we want to do, the department will do that. The executive branch of this Government will do what Congress tells it to do. They are all loyal men and will obey the laws.

Mr. FLOOD. Last year we appropriated for ambassadors and ministers $534,500 and expended $423,161, showing that a good deal of this money that we appropriated is not spent.

Mr. LITTLE. Then, there is no harm in cutting it off.

Mr. FLOOD. The time might come when it will be necessary.

Mr. LITTLE. It will never be necessary to have an ambassador to Turkey at $17,500.

Mr. FLOOD. But if we have an ambassador to Turkey he ought to be paid the same as other ambassadors.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman advise me who is the ambassador to Turkey?

Mr. FLOOD. We have not any ambassador there now.

Mr. SISSON. Did he resign, or is he drawing the salary?

Mr. FLOOD. He is not drawing any salary.

Mr. LITTLE. He is drawing the money unless he has been dismissed or resigned.

Mr. FLOOD. He is not in the service now, at any rate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am strongly of the opinion that Mr. Morgenthau resigned.

Mr. FLOOD. He is not in the Diplomatic Service now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out "Austria-Hungary" and insert "Austria-Hungary, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia raises a point of order on the amendment. The Chair sustains it.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, I guess not! You have to tell what the point of order is. Mr. Chairman, I ask what the point of order is.

Mr. FLOOD. We have not recognized any such country as that at this time, and there is no law authorizing the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is new legislation and sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Bolivia, Bulgaria, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Greece and Montenegro, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Uruguay, Persia, Peru, Portugal, Roumania, Salvador, Serbia, Siam, Sweden, Switzerland, and Venezuela, at $10,000 each, $230,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to correct the total of that amount. It is $230,000 in the printed bill. It ought to be $260,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the total will be corrected.

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROGERS. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] a question concerning the item appropriating $10,000 for the United States minister to Costa Rica. According to the Diplomatic Register, that official, appointed in 1913, is Mr. Edward J. Hale. I am informed that for the past two years or more Mr. Hale has been enjoying life at his home in North Carolina, that he has not visited his post in Costa Rica during that time, but that he has been drawing his full salary during the entire period. Can the gentleman give the committee any information on that point?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know about the statement that the gentleman makes, but I know if the minister to Costa Rica is in America, away from his post of duty, he could only draw pay for 60 days in a year. If he has been here for two years, away from his post of duty, he could not be drawing his salary.

Mr. LITTLE. He could if he is on leave.

Mr. FLOOD. He could get a leave of absence and draw pay for 60 days.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not a fact that by the extension of his leave his salary may be continued to him after the expiration of the 60 days?

Mr. FLOOD. No. He can only get leave with pay for 60 days in each year.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the gentleman will find, on looking into this particular case, that Mr. Hale has been drawing his salary for the entire two years.

Mr. FLOOD. I am not familiar with the case of Mr. Hale. I know that we have not recognized the present Government in Costa Rica, and that may account for the fact that our minister has not been there.

Mr. ROGERS. Can the gentleman inform the committee upon what grounds recognition has been declined?

Mr. FLOOD. It was a revolutionary government. It was the policy of the administration not to recognize administrations that gain power through revolutionary methods.

Mr. ROGERS. Was not President Tinoco, who, I believe, is the present incumbent of the Presidency of Costa Rica, elected at a regular and lawful election held some two years ago, and has he not been fulfilling all the duties of the office since that time?

Mr. FLOOD. He has been filling the duties of the office, and they had an election there, but it was not considered to be a regular election.

Mr. ROGERS. Why does the gentleman consider it a revolutionary government if the President's incumbency followed a regular election?

Mr. FLOOD. They had an election in Mexico, as the gentleman will remember, when Huerta was elected, but it was considered to be a revolutionary government all the same.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman surely does not cite the case of Mexico and the policy of the United States toward Mexico as a guide for the conduct of the United States in Costa Rica?

Mr. FLOOD. I think the policy of the United States Government with respect to Mexico has been a wise one and has been thoroughly approved by the American people. The time may have come to change that policy, but that does not affect its wisdom in the past.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman think that this Government's policy in Mexico was approved by the American people in November, 1918?

Mr. FLOOD. The Mexican policy of this present administration was not an issue in that election. It was an issue in 1916 and was approved by the people of America in the election that year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to state the situation as I understand it with reference to Costa Rica, and if I am misinformed I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is no representative of Costa Rica in this country.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that is true. That has been so for a considerable time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Therefore there is no possible use for our representative there, and certainly no excuse for his drawing a $10,000 salary.

Mr. ROGERS. Those things are usually correlated.

I do not remember the exact time when the election in Costa Rica was held, but it was something over two years ago. Gonzales was the retiring president, and the present incumbent, Tinoco, was the candidate against him. So far as I am aware, subject to correction by any member of the committee, that election was in all respects duly called and Tinoco was apparently duly elected. But the United States Government declined to recognize him and has steadfastly declined to recognize him ever since. In that respect it may be analagous with the Huerta case in Mexico; but in Costa Rica the question at issue in the election was pro-Germanism versus anti-Germanism. Gonzales was the pro-German candidate and Tinoco was the anti-German candidate. For that reason we had every reason to rejoice at the success of Tinoco and recognize him, especially when under his régime, within three days after the United States went to war with Germany, the Costa Rican Government passed a resolution offering to the United States every possible facility of its ports, at the same time expressing regret that they could not take a larger part in the war than they did on account of the country's size. Costa Rica even subsequently severed relations with Germany as a protest against the German Government and as an evidence of its friendship for the United States.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. What have the other countries, such as France, Great Britain, and Italy, done so far as recognition of the present incumbent is concerned?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know what the European countries have done toward recognizing the present Tinocan Republic, but every Republic on the American Continent, except our own, as I am advised, has long since recognized the Tinoco Government. Every Latin-American Republic, I am informed, early recognized the Tinoco Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], who seems to have been a student of Central American troubles, if it is not usually the practice of Governments to recognize the de facto government of a country?

Mr. ROGERS. That has been my understanding. That was certainly the precise policy that we followed in Peru, where the situation was quite similar to that in Mexico and Costa Rica, except that the new ruler had gained his seat as president as a result of the murder of his predecessor.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no information as to the virtue or lack of virtue in the de facto government in Costa Rica; but since reference has been made to it I want to call attention to the case in Mexico. I remember very well when Mexico was in the state of greatest turmoil and the question of what government to recognize was being considered, the practice of governments was stated in a very terse way in an English newspaper, which said that the purpose of the recognition of a government was to have order maintained and to protect life and property and international rights, and the writer said it had been the policy from time immemorial and was the proper policy to recognize the government of to-day if that government promised a restoration of order and the protection of life and property of the internationals. The writer of this article went on to say that if the rascal of yesterday became the dominant rascal of to-day, and under his administration promised reasonable security, it was the duty of the world to recognize him, and if another rascal promised better to-morrow and should have control of the government, then it was the duty and the practice of nations to recognize him. I do not know anything at all about the Costa Rican case, never having investigated it, but I believe that any government de facto which promises order and protection to life and property ought to be recognized.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to see if I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] correctly, that some one had succeeded to the Presidency by reason of having murdered his predecessor?

Mr. SLAYDEN. That was in Peru.

Mr. ROGERS. In the case of Peru, what I intended to say and what I did say was that the new President succeeded to the presidency as a result of the murder of his predecessor. He was not himself the murderer.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I should like to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 11 and 14, after the word "Greece," in line 11, strike out "and Montenegro," and in line 14 insert, after "Serbia," the words "and Montenegro."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the amendment if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] does not wish to do so.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a very peculiar thing is being done here by the committee. I happen to be familiar with the facts, so I feel it my duty to suggest to the House to correct it. If the committee do not want to accept my suggestion, I suppose they can run the steam roller over me, but I will say that I have just as good a steam roller as they have. I can make the point of no quorum any time I want to, but I do not propose to act foolishly if the committee does. If the committee does not want to correct this thing, that is in their power.

This Government formerly had the habit of saving money in the case of a group of small countries by appointing one minister to represent us in all of them. At one time all of these five Central American republics had only one American minister, but now they have one for each of the five.

If we should appoint one minister to Holland and Belgium, he could handle the business very well, because he could slip back and forth from capital to capital without any trouble. On the other hand, if we should appoint one minister to Holland and Portugal he would find it very difficult to handle the business at all. You can see that such a thing would be nonsense, although you could just as well appoint one minister to Holland and Belgium.

Last year I suggested that Serbia, Bulgaria, and Roumania ought to have a minister apiece instead of one for all three, but the State Department paid no attention to the suggestion. But they have it in the bill now. They have followed my suggestion after a year. The suggestion which I make here is just as pertinent. Serbia and Montenegro are people of the same tongue and the same race. They will probably soon be one nation. The minister who goes to Belgrade to represent us in Serbia can very easily find his way across to Montenegro and represent us in that country. There will be no difficulty in transacting business in both places. On the other hand, if you put Greece and Montenegro together they have nothing akin, do not get along together, do not speak the same language; they are very far apart, and the difficulties are of such a nature that it would be hard for the minister to Greece to visit Montenegro. The suggestion I make is sensible and would save money, time, and trouble. It would make it possible for one man to attend to both duties, whereas under the proposition the committee has offered it is impossible for the minister to Greece to be of service to Montenegro. I do not think because the committee has the power that they should neglect or refuse to accept this suggestion. This is no place for pride of opinion. There is no use in saying, "I can do this" or "I do not care what you say, we will do this or that." Anybody will tell you the geographical conditions, and any child at school will laugh when he sees what you have done. Why not arrange this matter so that the best results will be secured with the smallest amount of money? Why not appoint a minister to Montenegro and Serbia together instead of to Greece and Montenegro? He can go from one capital to the other and do business with both readily. I am not on the committee, and I can not, I guess, do anything more than make the suggestion. It is time we should have legislative discussion, not steam rollers.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Kansas is right in many of his statements, and perhaps they will be adopted finally by the departments; that the separation between Greece and Montenegro will take place.

Mr. LITTLE. Why not do it now?

Mr. FLOOD. Because we are in an unsettled condition; we can not tell what will be the geographical lines to be determined at the peace table. We are making the appropriation as we made it heretofore.

Mr. LITTLE. No; before you had in Roumania with Bulgaria and Serbia.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; we recognized other countries.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will permit, there is no injury done to the plan of the State Department by adopting my suggestion of putting Montenegro with Serbia instead of with Greece. It is evident that this was a mistake anyway, probably clerical.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] has just reminded us in conversation here that a few weeks ago, when Montenegro proposed a king, the assembled government passed a resolution uniting Montenegro with Serbia, just as now suggested by the gentleman from Kansas, ought to be the provision in this bill, so far as a minister is concerned. But, Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from Kansas that we are legislating here now and can not anticipate, just as the gentleman from Virginia has intimated, the action of the peace conference on the relations between these countries.

Mr. LITTLE. But the gentleman from Wisconsin does not get my suggestion. I am not anticipating any action of the peace conference. I am not now seeking to unite Serbia and Montenegro. My motion will leave them as two distinct and independent nations if they wish, as far as we are concerned. It says here that we shall send a minister to Greece and Montenegro. I say send one to Montenegro and Serbia, which leaves Montenegro and Serbia just as distinct as Montenegro and Greece.

Mr. FLOOD. Does not the gentleman think it would be wiser to wait until we know a little more about it?

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will permit, it makes no difference what happens at the peace conference, as far as my suggestion is concerned.

Mr. FLOOD. We have a minister assigned to Montenegro and Greece.

Mr. LITTLE. In the bill of last year you had one assigned to Roumania, Serbia, and Bulgaria, and one to Greece and Montenegro; formerly it was Roumania, Serbia, and Greece.

Mr. FLOOD. That was some time ago. For some years it has been the same as it is here.

Mr. LITTLE. At that time Montenegro was separated from Serbia by a few miles of Austrian territory, but now Serbia joins Montenegro. At that time there was no access from one to the other without crossing Austria, but now it is just a matter of a few hours' travel to get across there. You will have the two nations side by side, and a man can go back and forth in a few hours at any time, whereas the way you are arranging it they never can go back and forth, all one race and tongue.

Mr. FLOOD. I understand that Montenegro in all probability will be part of Serbia.

Mr. LITTLE. It will be probably.

Mr. FLOOD. Then the Serbian minister would represent us with that whole people, but the policy of the committee was not to undertake to make these changes until they had actually occurred, and, when the changes have occurred, then appropriations can be made, if there are additional ministers, for those ministers and meet any changes that have been made.

Mr. LITTLE. But you have changed from last year and given Roumania, Bulgaria, and Serbia each a minister.

Mr. FLOOD. Those are separate and distinct countries that we have recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. This is not a question of recognition; it is just a question of traveling back and forth. They always were separate and distinct countries, just as now—or have been for years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

Without objection, the amendment was again reported.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of getting some information. Did I understand the gentleman to say that we have different ministers each for Bulgaria and Serbia?

Mr. FLOOD. We are providing in this bill for separate ministers for Bulgaria, Roumania, and Serbia.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Have they been appointed as yet?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We have still one minister there.

Mr. FLOOD. We have a minister in Roumania.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He was acting before the war?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LITTLE) there were—ayes 8, noes 11.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, $534,500.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the total be changed to "$554,500."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the total.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For secretaries in the Diplomatic Service, as provided in the act of February 5, 1915, entitled "An act for the improvement of the foreign service," as amended by the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, approved July 1, 1916: Provided, That secretaries in the Diplomatic Service shall hereafter be graded and classified as follows: Secretaries of class 1, $3,500 per annum; secretaries of class 2, $3,125 per annum; secretaries of class 3, $2,500 per annum; secretaries of class 4, $2,000 per annum; $294,125.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I do not recall the grades carried in the appropriation bill of 1915. I do recall that last year we discontinued the lowest grade of pay of secretaries. Have we increased the original rates since they were graded back in 1915?

Mr. FLOOD. No; they are the same. The Committee on Foreign Affairs last year brought in a recommendation increasing the salaries of the first, second, third, and fourth grade secretaries $500 each. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made the point of order against the increases, and they went out on that point of order, and the committee has brought in the same recommendation this year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the existing practice all of these consulate employees are receiving some allowance based upon the higher cost of living.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; all of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that allowance equalizes the salaries occasioned by the higher cost of living in these respective countries?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. In this bill you seek to reduce the total amount of the allowance for that purpose?

Mr. FLOOD. No. The view of the committee in making this increase was not based on the increased cost of living but upon the fact that there should be a permanent increase. The view of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is that the secretaries in all embassies and legations get too little. Even under normal conditions their salaries are not sufficient to support them. All of these gentlemen get from the post allowance fund anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent of their salaries.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will they get that this year?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; this year, because the cost of living is as high now as it ever was and in some countries higher.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is aware there is quite a decided trend downward in the cost of food products. For instance, Argentine wheat is being sold in the market at Liverpool at $1.55. If the cost of living is going to be reduced——

Mr. FLOOD. Then the post allowances will be reduced.

Mr. STAFFORD. The fund at the disposal of the Secretary of State is the same?

Mr. FLOOD. The fund is the same, but it does not follow that the allowances of individuals will be the same; for example, if the cost of living in the current year would be 100 per cent greater than it was before the war, the secretary would get twice what his salary is. If the cost of living of the next year comes down 50 per cent, his post allowance would be just half.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any assurance officially from the State Department that there will be any money of the post allowance fund turned back because the cost of living will be reduced in the respective foreign capitals?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is such testimony?

Mr. FLOOD. This is what the State Department officials say. I do not know whether it is in the published hearings or not, but this is the rule and this is what they stated, that the post allowance is made to officials at a particular place with reference to the increased cost of living at that place, and if the cost of living goes up the post allowance of the official at that point is increased; if it goes down, the allowance is decreased. They are not going to expend any more than necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit. Has the gentleman made any inquiry as to whether any part of the $700,000 post fund which is provided for in this year's Diplomatic and Consular act——

Mr. FLOOD. What page?

Mr. STAFFORD. Page 22 of this year's bill—is going to be turned back to the Treasury because the State Department officials found that it was not necessary to pay all of that amount? It will be a cause celèbre in the disbursement of lump-sum appropriations if they can state anything of that kind.

Mr. FLOOD. Of course, they can not tell. The gentleman asked me a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. The State Department can not tell now what will be the result of this fund. For the year ending the 30th of June, 1918, they spent out of the post allowance fund $438,614.71, leaving a balance of $261,385.29. I say I have no information as to what will be left in the fund next July out of the current appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any testimony as to the status of this appropriation at the time the hearings were held on this bill?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I do not think we have, except it was said it would all be needed. I believe they will use most, if not all, of this fund this year.

Mr. GOOD. Was there any spent to add to or augment the salaries of secretaries of classes 3 and 4?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. To what extent?

Mr. FLOOD. To the same extent as in other cases. There was a regular system in the department of ascertaining at a particular place the increased cost of living, and they increased the secretaries and the clerks a per cent equal to the increased cost of living.

Mr. GOOD. Can the gentleman give the committee any idea of the range of that percentage?

Mr. FLOOD. It ranged from 50 per cent to sometimes over 100 per cent.

Mr. GOOD. Of their salaries?

Mr. FLOOD. Of their salaries. We had the case before us in reference to a consul in Russia whose salary was $5,500 and his post allowance $4,500, and in some instances it was fully as much as the salary.

Mr. GOOD. Secretaries of class 3 receiving a salary of $2,500 per annum and secretaries of class 4 $1,200 per annum would also receive during the present year the $120 additional compensation?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. GOOD. They are included in the provisions of the legislative bill and are entitled to the $120 increase.

Mr. FLOOD. No, indeed; they do not get anything on the legislative bill at all.

Mr. GOOD. They are included.

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, they never come under the legislative bill.

Mr. GOOD. They are Government employees?

Mr. FLOOD. The legislative bill does not embrace the people in the foreign service.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Any more than it does us.

Mr. GOOD. It embraces all the people in the foreign service.

Mr. FLOOD. It does not embrace our foreign service.

Mr. GOOD. It embraces all Government employees having a salary of $2,500 or less, except certain classes, and my recollection is—and it is only recollection—that the employees in the foreign service are not among the excepted classes.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know whether the language of the bill excepts them or not, but they do not come within the legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. The point of order against the increase?

Mr. STAFFORD. Against the increase; against the proviso carried in the first paragraph upon page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROGERS. That means the total should be reduced by $55,000 both on line 12 and on line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to correct the total in accordance with the amendment agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. First, I want to register a protest against these anonymous points of order. Every time an amendment is offered some gentleman, who has three or four of these anonymous points of order in his pocket, gets up and offers one, and we do not know what it is. I shall raise the point of order against every point of order after this, unless a man tells us what it is. Unless you state what is your point you have made no point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. What is the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. LITTLE. Nobody knows. It is anonymous.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any doubt that the paragraph is subject to the point of order?

Mr. FLOOD. Not the slightest.

Mr. STAFFORD. I made a point of order to the provision increasing the salaries of the secretaries.

Mr. GOOD. And making it permanent law also hereafter.

Mr. LITTLE. I have the floor. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. I have been reading this paragraph, on page 22, calling for $700,000 to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts.

Mr. FLOOD. I wish the gentleman would wait until we get to it.

Mr. LITTLE. It is apropos of the clause we are under now. I want some information. Would that take into consideration the difference in exchange springing from the fall in value of moneys in foreign countries? Has there been anything done in this bill to meet that?

Mr. FLOOD. Nothing in this bill. I understand from the officials of the State Department they have tried to adjust it in China, with consuls in China and officials of the court in China.

Mr. LITTLE. I understand, as to the minister to Persia, that the money has changed so much in that country, and therefore the exchange, that he, who has been drawing his salary according to the old rate of exchange, is now several thousand dollars in debt to this Government, and they are asking him to pay the money back. There ought to be somewhere in this bill, it seems to me, an adjustment to meet such a situation. For example, in Persia——

Mr. FLOOD. Exactly the same situation occurred with reference to the officers of our court in China.

Mr. LITTLE. In Shanghai?

Mr. FLOOD. In Shanghai; yes. We did adopt an amendment to protect those gentlemen. We heard nothing about this case in Persia. The case of these court officials was a very meritorious case, because they had been informed that they were embraced under the post allowance, and received the post allowances accordingly, and it was afterwards determined by an official of the Treasury Department that they were not entitled to it and they were required to pay the post allowances back.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not want to urge my requests on the chairman when he does not give them any consideration, but I am going to ask him again to take into consideration the idea of the cost of exchange. It puts a minister to Persia, for example, at an expense of several thousand dollars, I understand.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know about the minister to Persia, unless his salary has less purchasing power.

Mr. LITTLE. They have been paying him according to the old rate of exchange.

Mr. FLOOD. What they paid him was paid him in gold, and his gold was worth a great deal more over there at that time than it is now.

Mr. LITTLE. I understand now the department is asking him to pay a lot of that money back.

Mr. FLOOD. I never heard it. I do not see how it can be, because he was not entitled to anything under the post allowance.

Mr. LITTLE. My information is pretty reliable. I think it is as good as that of the State Department.

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman informs the department of that fact, the department will certainly be disposed to treat him fairly, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs will treat him fairly.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish the chairman of the committee would consider that matter to-night and inquire about it from the department.

Mr. FLOOD. I will inquire of the department.

Mr. LITTLE. I think this ought to be adjusted. I think section 22 is the place to do it, and I have no doubt, if the gentleman will take it up with the department, it can be remedied.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant secretary-interpreter to the embassy to Turkey, to be appointed from the corps of student interpreters, $2,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 20, 21, and 22. I simply want to say that I notice up above a secretary-interpreter to Turkey gets $3,600, and they have an assistant t $2,000.

The reason why I move to strike out is that I happen to know it is a pure waste of money.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 3, strike out lines 20, 21, and 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FLOOD. All the information that I have or that the committee had was obtained from the officials of the State Department, and they tell us that these interpreters are very essential and necessary. They will be necessary in that country when conditions are restored to normal. They are not paid unless they are rendering service there. They may be transferred to some other place now.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I suggest that they might have been necessary at Constantinople, but they will never be necessary there again, and it is pure foolishness to be paying out that money now. They have a Sultan at Cairo, and he will be more powerful than the Sultan of Turkey has or will have. The Sultan of Egypt is now caliph of the faithful, successor to Mahomet.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, $310,925.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 3, line 23, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"The following persons formerly connected with the American Embassy at Berlin be, and they are hereby, authorized to accept pieces of plate presented to them by the British Government in recognition of services rendered by the embassy while in charge of British interests in Germany: Mr. Joseph C. Grew, counselor of embassy; Messrs. Hugh R. Wilson, Albert B. Ruddock, Alexander C. Kirk, L. Lanier Winslow, Lithgow Osborne, Oliver B. Harriman, Robert M. Scotten, and Charles H. Russell, jr., secretaries of embassy or legation; Brig. Gen. Joseph E. Kuhn and Maj. George T. Langhorne, United States Army; Lieut. Col. C. L. Furbush, Medical Corps, National Army; Maj. Albert H. Roler, Medical Reserve Corps, United States Army; Lieut. Grafton W. Minot, Ordnance Reserve Corps, United States Army; Lieut. Jerome P. Webster, Medical Reserve Corps; Mr. H. R. Pyne, Aviation Service, United States Army; Commander Walter R. Gherardi and Surg. Karl Ohnesorg, United States Navy; Director A. E. Taylor, War Trade Board; Mr. Christian A. Hertel, Department of State; Mr. E. L. Dresel and Miss G. de Courcy, employed at American Legation at Berne."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I reserve a point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas reserve his point of order?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, this is subject to a point of order. I will admit that. Possibly the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] will care to debate the point of order, and I would be glad to have him do so if he is in doubt about it.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will come around to my office later, I will discuss it with him.

Mr. ROGERS. The amendment which I have offered is in the exact language of a bill that passed the Senate on May 15 last, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs on June 26, and has been on our Private Calendar for the last nine months.

Gentlemen know the condition of the Private Calendar and the extreme difficulty of getting any bill considered which is upon it. I therefore hope that the merits of this measure are such as to lead the House to allow it to be comprehended within this appropriation bill. The men who are enumerated here were all connected with our embassy in Berlin during the period when we were protecting British interests in Germany. It has become customary after a service of that kind for the Government that has been thus cared for to present trifling remembrances to the individual members who rendered this service. Great Britain had more use and more need for the services of our American representatives in Berlin than had ever been witnessed in the history of the world in a similar cause. Consequently, very naturally and very properly, Great Britain sent to the State Department silver articles, in value from $15 up to $85, designating the articles for presentation to the different individuals, corresponding in a general way to their rank in the Diplomatic Service. These articles are at the State Department, and they may be inspected by any Member interested.

Legislation, however, is necessary to permit the acceptance of these articles by the recipients. You are all familiar with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which makes such congressional action a necessary prerequisite. It is to provide the congressional sanction that this amendment is being offered. The bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LITTLE. What are they going to get?

Mr. ROGERS. An inkstand, or the like, from the British Government, as a mark of appreciation for their service to that Government for two and a half years during our period of neutrality.

Mr. LITTLE. Is that all they get?

Mr. ROGERS. That is all, I hope. The articles are of trifling value; most of them are inkstands, worth about $15. It is not the intrinsic value which appeals to the gentlemen enumerated in the amendment; it is the fact that after they have worked two and a half years under the most terrific strain and pressure they naturally would like to have some permanent recognition which they can put on their tables or mantelpieces to show to their children and grandchildren. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has favorably recommended this proposition to the House, very much influenced, I think, by the letter which the Secretary of State wrote and which is printed in the report on this bill. He says:

> We should recognize the spirit of gratitude which induced the British Government to offer this plate, and that as an act of international comity it would be appropriate and courteous to permit its acceptance by the beneficiaries.

This same report cites about 100 different cases, some of recent years and some of a more remote period, where Congress has granted the sanction required by the Constitution. In view of the circumstances I hope the gentleman will be induced to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that in reserving the point of order, which I expect to make, I intend no reflection on the services of these distinguished gentlemen, but I am absolutely opposed to the principle of the amendment as it is offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. If these gentlemen rendered distinguished services as employees of the Government of the United States it was as representatives of the United States and not by reason of the fact that, incidentally, they were called upon to represent the interests of Great Britain. If they desire a recognition of their services it should be extended by the Republic in whose service they were employed. I think that in this time of all times it would be bad policy, indeed, for the American Congress to sanction the practice of representatives at foreign capitals accepting favors or gifts at the hands of foreign governments, however slight the recognition might be.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do.

Mr. ROGERS. Would the gentleman be willing, in view of the fact that this imposes no charge on the Treasury, to withdraw his point of order and allow the amendment to be voted on upon its merits?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It is not a question of a charge on the Treasury which is involved in the point of order. It is opposition to the principle of permitting our representatives abroad or at home accepting any recognition in the way of gifts from any foreign power or potentate.

Mr. ROGERS. This principle has been recognized by Congress scores of times.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not responsible for the acts of any Member of Congress prior to this Congress, but I am responsible for my vote and my position on this floor, and I make the point of order for the reasons stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill at the earliest possible moment, as I am in favor of the passage of other appropriation bills at the earliest possible moment consistent with proper discussion. I call attention to the lateness of the hour only because there is to be a conference this evening.

Mr. FOSTER. A conference or a caucus?

Mr. LONGWORTH. A conference.

Mr. FOSTER. Public or private?

Mr. LONGWORTH. A conference at 8 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It was agreed that we should rise at 6 o'clock. That is only seven minutes from now.

Mr. WALSH. We were going to rise at 6 o'clock if we were in general debate.

Mr. FLOOD. No; whatever was going on.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman contemplates rising at 6 o'clock?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For the employment of necessary clerks at the embassies and legations, who, whenever hereafter appointed, shall be citizens of the United States, $688,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here is quite a decided increase in the appropriation over that carried in the current law, an appropriation of $688,000, which is $200,000 more than was carried in last year's appropriation act. Yet we carried a provision last year that the money should be immediately available. I assume that at the time this bill passed the House last year the fund was depleted and that it was necessary to use some of the amount then estimated for the remainder of the then fiscal year. What is the occasion of this very large increase of appropriation, nearly 50 per cent?

Mr. FLOOD. There is really no increase, but only an apparent one. The Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill passed last year carried $488,000 and the deficiency appropriation act of November 4, 1918, added $200,000 to that sum, making a total of $688,000, which is the amount this bill carries this year, and it is the amount the department needed and asked for clerks at embassies and legations. They got $488,000 last year from the Foreign Affairs Committee and afterwards $200,000 from the Committee on Appropriations because they needed it, and they say they need exactly the same amount this year, so we have given them that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salaries do these clerks receive at the respective embassies and legations?

Mr. FLOOD. The salaries vary from $1,000 to $2,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is $2,500 the maximum?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know of any clerk who gets more than $2,500. I think that is the highest amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do these clerks also receive an allowance from the post-allowance fund?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; they do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps the explanation for this large increase is due to the policy recently established by the department of requiring that the clerks at embassies and legations shall be citizens of the United States rather than citizens of foreign countries.

Mr. FLOOD. These clerks are all citizens of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is, as I recall, a recent requirement of the law?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman now move that the committee rise, in view of the fact that the next item is going to provoke some discussion?

Mr. FLOOD. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FERRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14516) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ROBBINS, indefinitely, on account of illness (at the request of Mr. ROSE).

To Mr. BANKHEAD, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. EAGLE, for four days, on account of illness in his family.

FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, disagree to Senate amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12011, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WEBB, Mr. CARLIN, Mr. STEELE, Mr. VOLSTEAD, and Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until Wednesday, January 22, at 11 o'clock a. m.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WEBB, Mr. CARLIN, Mr. STEELE, Mr. VOLSTEAD, and Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigation, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat, to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel, and in producing commercial products, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FOSTER, Mr. WINGO, and Mr. DENISON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 11948) granting the consent of Congress to the Great Southern Lumber Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, doing business in the State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across Pearl River at or near the north line of section 22 of the basis meridian, in the land district east of Pearl River, in the State of Mississippi, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

R. 13306) to authorize the payment of allotments out of the pay of enlisted men in certain cases in which these payments have been discontinued, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 655) thereon.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ASHURST. I offer the following amendment to add a new section, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

That every soldier, sailor, and marine in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, upon receiving an honorable discharge shall be entitled to keep and retain as his own property the uniform, overcoat, and other articles of apparel he is wearing at the time of such discharge from the service, and no charge or debit whatever shall be entered against the account of any such discharged soldier or sailor or marine by reason of his retaining said uniform, overcoat, and other articles of apparel. And there shall be paid to every such soldier, sailor, and marine full pay for the 90 days next ensuing after the date of his honorable discharge.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Arizona whether this is to apply only to soldiers who are discharged after the passage of the bill or to what soldiers and sailors does the privilege extend?

Mr. ASHURST. It is impossible to hear the Senator's questions, there is so much confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. KNOX. I want to know whether this applies only to soldiers and sailors who are to be discharged after the passage of the bill or whether——

Mr. ASHURST. I may not have been very happy in the use of language, but it was the intention of the amendment that it should apply to all honorably discharged soldiers of the war with Germany, and I thank the Senator for calling attention to it. I think the amendment is lame in that respect, and I would welcome an amendment from the Senator making it certain, so that there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Arizona can perfect his amendment to cover the idea if he approves of it. I think all should be included.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was a bill of that kind which passed the House some days ago and came to the Senate, and it was passed in the Senate with some amendments. I think it covers the very situation proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. I think it may lead to confusion if we undertake to add the amendment at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. I think the Senator's observation is correct. Therefore I further modify my amendment by striking out that part of the amendment which relates to uniforms and other articles of apparel. I ask leave to modify the amendment so as to add a new section, as follows:

There shall be paid to every soldier, sailor, and marine in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, upon his receiving an honorable discharge, full pay for the 90 days next ensuing after the date of his honorable discharge, which said sum of money shall be paid to him without regard to whether he was discharged before or subsequent to the signing of the armistice.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was a provision added to the very bill to which I have just referred allowing the men one month's pay. The Senator's amendment differs from that in that he proposes to give them three months' pay.

Mr. ASHURST. Three months' pay.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There has been a bill already passed by the Senate for one month's pay.

Mr. ASHURST. There was, it is true, an amendment adopted on the revenue bill providing for one month's pay; but I apprehend that it will be some time before the conferees agree on the revenue bill. Moreover, while one month's extra pay was proper, I feel persuaded, as I said the other day, in view of the fact that this $100,000,000 is a gift, a bounty, a charity, and I gladly support it, it is going to feed persons who if they come here will come to destroy, not enjoy, our institutions. It is going to men who know nothing, and most of them care less, about civil liberty as we understand it on this continent.

But, as I said the other day, better no charity than that grudgingly given, and so I am going to vote for the appropriation of $100,000,000.

Pardon me for a moment while I repeat what I said the other day. It is doubtful whether we have a right to use public funds for charity, but charity is so sweet, so gentle, and so merciful an attribute that we can not refuse to dispense any charity, especially when it is the other fellow's money that we are giving out.

But, as I said the other day, justice not charity builds government. You can not build governments on mercy and charity. It is justice that makes one love his country.

These young American soldiers of the great war were touched by the mysterious finger of duty. They left their gainful occupations. Many of them will have the currents of their entire lives diverted and changed.

I apprehend that probably 40 or 50 per cent of these soldiers do not at all need this $90 which would be paid to them, but there are many of them who will appreciate it and who can make immediate use of it in obtaining for themselves another position or in reassuring their old positions and putting themselves back again into the activities in civil life they once exercised. Had these young American soldiers not stepped into the breach and hurled back the Huns and saved us from the atrocity of the Bulgar, the Magyar, and the Turk we would have had no charity to dispense. We would have had no law and order and no civil liberty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield, but I was going to yield the floor in a moment.

Mr. BORAH. I will wait until the Senator concludes.

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad to yield now.

Mr. BORAH. I was only going to say that I agree with the Senator from Arizona as to the attributes of charity, but I think with the Senator from Arizona also that as to this particular charity the amendment which he now offers helps to make it palatable.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not know what construction my friend places on my remarks. I said twice I regard this appropriation of $100,000,000 as a charity that is going to starving men, men whose indolence and neglect have lost a large amount of the world's supply of food.

Mr. BORAH. I do not disagree with the Senator. I say, then, the Senator regards it as a charity and also regards it as essential to sugar-coat the charity by this amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. If I can sugar-coat a nauseous pill, which pill is good for the physical body, I shall certainly sugar-coat it. I appreciate the humor of the able Senator. I repeat these young soldiers left civil life. They are going to be demobilized. It was wise and proper that they should have their uniforms. The amendment giving them their uniforms is not original with me. That was introduced by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] two or three months ago. It is a worthy amendment, and I am glad it has passed both Houses of Congress. But I do insist, and I feel very earnest about it, that if we can afford, in view of the enormous drains upon our Federal Treasury, to give charity to those who do not understand our Government, do not appreciate it, and do not love it, surely we can do some meed and measure of justice to those American soldiers who have been taken out of civil life and have saved our civilization.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield to the Senator. I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had not intended to take any part in this debate, for if the pending bill is to be passed at all, it should be passed as soon as possible. I have not yet determined whether I shall vote for or against it, because I have serious misgivings both as to the justice and the validity of our proposed action; but I can not allow an amendment of this sort to reach a vote without recording my protest against it. It is, in my judgment, the first of a series of measures designed to transform our splendid Army into a huge band of mercenaries, and to define their ideals of duty and patriotism by standards of monetary compensation. It is the introduction of a sinister feature into legislation as one of the aftermaths of this war, the fruits of which will be bitter, if, indeed, they do not ultimately spell financial ruin.

Mr. President, I yield to no man in my devotion to the American soldier, in my recognition of his magnificent performance of his duty, in the breadth and depth of his sacrifice, in the debt which civilization owes to him for its preservation; but I will not believe that an American Army every fought for a money compensation. If so, then duty becomes a sordid subject of financial reward and not of right or of conscience.

Mr. President, if it be true that because of the sacrifices which the soldiers at the front have made for the salvation of our institutions, we should place our hands in the Public Treasury, now almost empty, and take from it $350,000,000 and distribute it among them whether they need it or not—and the Senator says that a great many of them do not need it—why should we not recognize that principle of justice which the Senator invokes for his amendment and reward others who are equally entitled to consideration?

This war, Mr. President, was not fought in the trenches or at the front only. It was fought in this country; it was fought by every man manufacturing munitions; by every man in the shipyards; by every individual engaged in the performance of public service in the city of Washington; by every farmer sowing grain; by every planter raising cotton; by every woolgrower tending his herds and flocks; by every stock raiser increasing his herds; in other words, by every woman and every child engaged in the great work of winning this war in whatever capacity. This was a war not between armies, but between nations. It consisted of the mobilization not of men alone, but of material, of women and children; of the man behind the front as well as the man at the front.

Justice is said to be even-handed, and nothing is justice which is unequal in its operation. Why not, when these people at home have done all these things, give them each a suit of clothes plus $90? Instead of stopping at $350,000,000, why not do this thing by wholesale and devote $3,500,000,000 to this work of representing justice and paying men and women for the performance of their duty.

Mr. President, after all, this money is at our disposal. We can squander it if we will, but it comes from the taxpayer, who also has had something to do with the winning of this war. He labored harder than ever and the burden of his public contributions was multiplied many fold. It its last analysis, with a few exceptions, it falls upon the backs of the producer and the consumer.

Mr. President, if this country has been preserved only to enable us to pass on huge quantities of our revenues obtained by taxes to the soldiers, if we are to bankrupt what war has secured, I have some question whether it was worth saving.

I dread, Mr. President, to contemplate the effect upon the morale in civil life of this proposed congressional policy, which recognizes and establishes a money standard for public service. I by no means would oppose, on the contrary, I would advocate, and do advocate, that this Government care for every man who has, through disease or wounds, been so incapacitated for self-support and for the support of his family, the extremes of liberality; that is an obligation we owe. I want to see the Government exercise itself, as far as it can consistently do, to secure such employment for these men when they come home, but I do not want to look these boys in the face and say, "You have done well; what shall be the size of your tip? Uncle Sam has millions of money and expects to raise millions more; we will pay you in accordance with what you think the measure of your duty commands."

Mr. President, we hear of profiteers in this country and some patrioteers. If this amendment carries we shall soon have an army of pensioneers—a greater army of pensioneers than we ever had before. We may begin this practice of voluntarily giving these enormous sums of money to returning soldiers, but the time is not far distant when they will demand other sums as a right and not as a bestowal of congressional bounty. I do not believe in it.

I am appalled, Mr. President, at the enormous sums which are represented by bill after bill introduced into this Congress appropriating untold treasures for this, that, and the other object. A million dollars used to be a fair average for special appropriation bills. Then it became ten millions, and now it is a hundred millions. A bill was introduced yesterday, I believe, appropriating $100,000,000 for a very desirable object the Secretary of the Interior recommends. The pending bill calls for the appropriation of $100,000,000. And the Senator from Iowa wants another $100,000,000 for employment bureaus.

Mr. President, where are these funds coming from? We are extremely generous and liberal with other people's money; we pay our political debts with public money. We yield to the persuasions, the entreaties, and the threats of our constituents who want money out of the Public Treasury for unnumbered projects, and we give it to them. How long will this thing continue? There is great unrest in the country. Every scheme which can not finance itself comes to the Treasury and finds advocates either at the other end of the Capitol or here, or both, and inasmuch as under our system of legislation a bill, regardless of its title, may contain legislation of any sort whatever, we load bills down with riders carrying appropriations for objects which are utterly foreign to the mind of the Senator or the Representative who drafted the original bill.

I do not want to see this policy of voting money to soldiers begun, but if it shall be, let us not confine our liberality with the public money to the man who wears the uniform. Let us give it to every man, woman, and child in the country who has served the Nation in its time of need. When you apply this policy of legislation to the present Army, I want to warn the Senate and the public that no man can foresee what the end of it will be. It will increase in mathematical progression as time goes on and taxes will increase correspondingly. While the taxpayer has been quiescent, marvelously quiescent, paralyzed, it would seem by his inaction, you will hear from him sooner or later; he will have enough of it before he lives very much longer; and when he rouses himself I predict that those who have been most liberal with the Public Treasury will be the first to announce their change of heart and seek atonement by insisting upon a frugality so rigidly economical as to arrest the machinery of administration. I trust, Mr. President, that this and all similar bills and amendments will be defeated, in the Senate, at least.

A Senator near me asks the pertinent question, "Have these boys asked for this gratuity?" I do not believe they have. I believe that the young American boy at the front, native and naturalized, feels ample compensation in the consciousness of duty performed in the maintenance of American standards and the contribution of his part to the salvation of his country's institutions.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I indorse much of what has been said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and I am opposed to this and to all other amendments to this bill. The government that adopts a system of procedure that will cause the individual citizen to lose his initiative and depend upon the Government for support and assistance rather than to rely upon himself has done its citizen a great injury, and when it has caused that sort of an opinion to prevail amongst all its citizens it has done itself an injury that ultimately will result in destruction. This is not the time or place, however, to settle our soldiers' compensation, and no Senator here is disposed to be more liberal to them than am I.

But without regard to that, the time has come, it seems to me, when we should proceed about this matter as it ought to be proceeded with. We have finished this war so far as the fighting is concerned, we understand, but the most important part of it still remains to be done; we must settle the matter finally and for the future, for our own and the world's benefit.

Our representative is yonder, in the greatest world's conference of all the ages. Our representative has committed us to this policy; he has said it will improve conditions to such an extent that we may bring about a successful termination of the conference, and that we may procure what ought to be obtained for the United States of America and for the world; that it will conduce and contribute to that end greatly. We have been committed to this policy by the President of the United States of America, the representative of this body and the Nation and of our entire people in the world's peace conference, and it seems to me the time has come when we should treat it upon that broad ground. If we do not propose to support this measure, then vote it down as a whole, but do not tie other amendments on to it. Let it be an expression of the Congress of the United States as to whether we will back up our representative and strengthen and extend his influence in the peace conference, as he has suggested should be done, in order to bring about a successful termination and ending of the war for us and for the world.

We are there insisting upon certain things for the benefit of the nations of the world. We fought this war for the freedom of the seas. Our declaration of war shows that; our entire policy shows it. We have fought other wars for the freedom of the seas, and we will fight yet other wars hereafter, if necessary, for the freedom of the seas for the United States of America if the principle is not properly recognized, adjusted, and concluded by the peace conference now in session in the Old World. That is what we have been insisting upon. Now we are there to finish the negotiations and conclude the matter. It has been thought by our representative that this appropriation will improve the conditions and our standing there; and I repeat that we ought to vote it up or vote it down without regard to anything else or any other question that might be tacked on to it.

There is a growing fear in this country, because of dissension expressed here, that we are not going to insist upon our rights in the peace conference. Why do I say that? Has not the head of the Navy Department of the United States of America already said that we must build the greatest Navy in the world? Why? Because of the fear, evidently, that the freedom of the seas will not be properly safeguarded yonder in the world's peace conference in session now. That sentiment has been voiced by the head of the Navy Department. There has been distrust manifested by the military branch of the Government in saying what? That we must maintain a large Military Establishment, and also by some of the Senators here in saying that we must have universal military training. What is the purpose of it all? In order that we may be prepared and able to protect ourselves against any and all of the nations of the world when the necessity arises, at any and all times. Why have the greatest Navy on earth? Only to protect our rights and secure the freedom of the seas, which can and should be safeguarded in the world's peace conference. Freedom of the seas means that all of our merchantmen, all our liners, and all our Navy shall have the right to the unrestricted use of all the seas of all the world in peace times and in war, subject only to those well-defined rules and practices that have from long usage grown up, been adopted, recognized, and established by international law and such others as shall be determined upon by the peace conference now in session. If we shall have the greatest Navy in the world, it will make no difference to us, of course, about the principle of the freedom of the seas. That is the condition that confronts us yonder. Our representatives are on the ground; our treasure has been expended; our soldiers have nobly laid down their lives at our country's call; the war has been fought and won; and now let us conclude the peace terms and close it out successfully. Our representative, the President, has said that it can best be done by this contribution to alleviate the starvation and want of the people of the nations of the world, who must have help now, and we are the people to supply it. Shall we disparage the influence of our representative, the President of the United States, by refusing to follow his recommendation at the very time when it ought to be greatest?

We are committed to this policy by him, we are committed to this recommendation; we are able to carry it out; I believe it will be worth the money; and I say here to-day and now that we ought to pass on this bill alone, by itself, absolutely separate from all other questions, and either vote for it or vote against it; and, so far as I am concerned, I am going to vote for it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, whatever my personal views may be with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I do not believe that it ought to be put on this bill. We have already acted along the lines of the amendment, not going so far, however, as the Senator from Arizona would go, and probably not so far as I would go; but, as I have said, I do not think that it ought to go on this bill.

In connection with certain discussions that have been had with reference to it, I think it quite appropriate that I should read a letter that I received this morning from a soldier with reference to the proposition involved, and especially referring to a proposition being advanced in the country, which seems to have a great deal of support behind it. It is being urged very strenuously that the Government of the United States should pay $300 to every soldier upon his discharge. I am getting letter after letter urging this. I received several such letters this morning.

As I have said, I have a letter here from a soldier which I wish to read. I believe that it expresses very largely the views of the soldiers themselves, and I am going to read it. It is dated January 15, 1918, but it evidently means 1919, and is from a place in my State.

> I might preface my remarks by saying that I am a returned soldier, and as such I believe my opinion has more weight than that of a number of people who are advocating giving the soldiers who are discharged something for nothing. I refer to the agitation to give each man $300 to assist him in reestablishing himself in civil life. It is my opinion that while each man who is discharged should receive some extra compensation, that sum of money, above mentioned, given to the men would serve more to promote idleness than to encourage a keenness for seeking positions of usefulness in civil life.
> The men in the camps awaiting their discharge are at the present time practically wasting their time doing "bunk" fatigue, as we called it, and idleness started in this manner should receive no further subsidy after a man is discharged.
> I do not believe, however, in the present policy of sending the men away from the camps practically penniless, because a fellow needs about $100 to outfit himself with civilian clothing and support himself during a reasonable period of time prior to employment.
> A sum which is comparatively small to the $1,200,000,000 necessary to pay each discharged man $300 could be spent far more effectively in enlarging the activities of the Federal Bureau of Labor, and cooperating with the States in reclaiming lands, stimulating land settlement, and making permanent public improvements, and in many other ways aiding in the employment of returned soldiers, unable otherwise to secure work.

This man does not even ask the Government to give them that gratuity of $100. He says that they are ready and willing to work for it.

When I entered the service I sacrificed much, but feel that the self-satisfaction from making the sacrifice would be largely counteracted by any money I am not entitled to now. When I was discharged I felt that all the country owed me was enough money to get out of the uniform and support for a month while I was locating some work which I was fitted to do.

That letter comes from a returned soldier. He signs his name to it. I shall not put the name in the RECORD, however.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator to put the name of that writer in the RECORD, because he is a typical American soldier and I think deserves the thanks of the Senate for expressing himself so candidly and so patriotically upon a very important proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He signs his name. He does not give it in confidence. He does not ask me to withhold his name, and I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado and sympathize with it; but I also know what he might be subjected to if his name were published, and I believe I shall withhold the name at this time, at any rate.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to take just a few minutes in connection with the bill.

I do not know of any measure that has disturbed me so much as this measure. The more I examine the detailed reasons given for the passage of the bill the less reason I find for voting for it; and yet, when I look at the situation as it is, I am rather inclined to think that I shall support it, but not on the grounds of charity; not upon the detailed reasons set out in the various cablegrams that have been read to the Senate as to why it should pass, and what it will accomplish, and what it will bring about. I do not believe that the passage of this measure will hinder the growth or development of bolshevism. Really, I am afraid that it will encourage it rather than retard it, for reasons that I shall not take the time of the Senate to go into; but, Mr. President, this is the situation as it appears to me:

The war, no matter what we may say, is not yet ended. It has not been concluded. The President of the United States is striving to secure a peace that will conclude the war. He is our constitutional representative, acting within the limits of the Constitution and, I think, within the powers given to him. He has seen fit to place himself upon the peace commission, and he has gone to Europe to negotiate, upon the part of the United States, a peace that will conclude the greatest war that the world has ever experienced. He is there as our representative. As a matter of fact, he is our real representative on that commission. The other members of the commission are simply puppets or dummies upon the commission. The President is the commission. Whatever he says, so far as the action of this country is concerned, will be done. He represents us and our country. Now, he says to us this in his cablegram:

Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solution of peace.

Mr. President, I may not agree with that utterance; I may not believe that the President is right in expressing that opinion, or that his judgment is correct, but he is on the ground. He ought to know the situation better than I do; and as the representative of this Government, as the Commander in Chief of our Army, as the constitutional representative of this country in the negotiation of a treaty of peace, he solemnly states to Congress that the food situation is the key to the solution of peace, and he asks us to pass this measure as a measure to help in bringing about peace. In other words, he asks the passage of this bill as a war measure, as a measure to properly conclude this war.

I have voted during the conduct of this war for many measures the wisdom of which I doubted. I have supported every proposition that was considered necessary and essential to the proper prosecution of this war; and if the President is right in this statement, this measure is just as essential as a war measure, as a measure to conclude the treaty of peace that we hope will end war hereafter, as any other measure that has come before Congress during the last two or three years.

Mr. President, if I vote for the measure—and I rather think now that I will—it will be solely upon that ground. I hope the amendments that have been put in the bill will be eliminated. They ought not to be in this measure. If this is necessary, the President ought to have it without any strings on it. If it is not necessary, if we do not believe that it ought to be passed, then we ought to reject it outright.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to take the time of the Senate for just a few minutes to discuss briefly a matter that was referred to incidentally yesterday, a matter that I think is of tremendous importance, and the facts regarding which the American people should know.

I am not disposed to criticize the administration for every mistake made in connection with the war. Mistakes were bound to be made in the carrying on of such a huge undertaking. We may justly be more critical now, although mistakes will occur now for which no one can be justly blamed. The winning of the war, however, will not now furnish an excuse for failures that common prudence and reasonable business judgment would have avoided.

There is a great deal of talk about reconstruction and the problems of reconstruction. The problems that confront us are not the problems of reconstruction, but the problems of readjustment. Our cities, properties, and industries have not been destroyed. Growth and development have simply been stopped or checked. Industry, energy, and resources have been diverted from their usual activities into war production and activity. The problem now is to readjust and get back to normal.

Labor must go from war work to peace work. Its hours must be rearranged. The demand for it will doubtless affect wages. Capital must seek new lines of employment. Its use and activity will depend much upon the prospect of a good return. Its activity will greatly affect labor. If capital is idle, labor is unemployed.

There is much agitation now for undertaking all sorts of governmental works in order to furnish employment for war workers and returning soldiers. We may have to resort to some such means as a sort of reservoir to care for surplus labor until reasonably normal conditions come about. Whenever and wherever capital desires to make a legitimate investment that will employ American labor and demand American material, can anyone imagine a good reason for denying it the privilege of doing so?

Governmental agencies, however, are doing that very thing right now, and I hope this will receive attention. It deserves attention. It deserves the attention of Congress, and it seems to me it ought to command the attention of the people of the country, when they know what is being done. With men by the thousands going without work, capital is denied the right to engage in work that would employ thousands of laboring men and keep them employed for months to come. For such action I can see no justification. It is more than a mistake. It is utter incompetency. The facts are undisputed, and the responsibility is clear. I propose to call to the attention of the Senate and of the country a few of these facts, and I also propose to show where the responsibility lies.

We are engaged in carrying on a great shipbuilding program. Three billion or more dollars of the people's money are being put into shipyards, docks, and ships. The old American spirit that helped put American ships in every port and our flag on every sea is awakening. With an eye to the future, American capital has gone into American shipyards or is ready to go into the shipbuilding industry, notwithstanding governmental activities. While the war was on these yards were a great national asset. Now that the war is closed why should they be denied work that seeks them and that would in no way interfere with the Government's program?

What are the facts? When the war ceased Norway wanted a million tons of wooden ships built. Her tonnage had been ruthlessly destroyed. She wanted to replace it. To her seafaring people the world's sea commerce was most inviting. Her capitalists came to our shipyards. The yards were ready to build these ships, but permits to build for foreign account had to be secured from the Shipping Board. They could not be secured. These contracts went to British builders. American labor was idle, American capital unemployed, American material unused.

On December 6, 1918, the Shipping Board removed the restrictions against building wooden ships for foreign account without a permit, and since then American yards can build wooden ships for foreign accounts without waiting for permission from the Government. This opportunity is gone, however. One or two hundred millions of dollars that should have gone to our labor and producers has gone to a foreign country that was wise enough to act for her own interests as soon as the war closed. Forty wooden ships are to-day building in British Columbia that would have been built at Tacoma, Wash., if a permit could have been secured. Is this a mere mistake? Is there any reasonable excuse for it? Thousands of American laborers are idle who would have had months of employment at good wages. Does this aid in reconstruction, in readjustment?

There are idle shipyards in this country to-day. Capital wants to let contracts for the construction of steel ships. These idle shipyards can not take these contracts. Why not? Because these ships are for foreign account, and these yards can not take contracts for foreign account without a permit from the United States Shipping Board, and the United States Shipping Board will not give the permits. Perhaps it would be better for me to say it can not give them, for the reason that I shall show just a little bit later.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator is going to refer to an article that appeared on the first page of the Washington Post this morning, which indicated that there was a difference of opinion between the President and Mr. Hurley as to what the policy should be in this matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I did not intend to refer to that article. I saw it. It is the surmise of a newspaper man. He does not know anything about it. There are all sorts of surmises around here as to why this policy is being pursued. I have had no intimation from any source that Mr. Hurley believes differently, or believes in a different policy; but I have an authoritative statement showing how the other members of the Shipping Board feel about it, and I shall refer to it a little bit later on.

The Foundation Co. put in a wooden-ship yard at Tacoma, Wash., and other yards elsewhere. This yard was put in with French money and took a contract to build 20 wooden ships for France. It completed its contract a short time after the armistice was signed. France wants steel ships. She wants them in a hurry. She began negotiations with the people who had invested their money in the shipyards at Tacoma and Portland and at other points in this country. She wanted one hundred and fifty 8,800-ton ships. These wooden-ship yards could be converted into steel yards in 60 days. The owners wanted to do it. They could not get a permit, however, to build these steel ships. The Tacoma yard is idle to-day, although it is anxious to construct these ships. American labor is unemployed and American material is unused. I am reliably informed that the French have let contracts to British shipbuilders for over 300,000 tons of these steel ships, and it is very likely that contracts will soon be let for the whole amount. Our policy may be wise, but I can not see it. The American people may applaud it, but I do not believe so. Such a course may assist in readjustment, but it seems to me it will make it more difficult.

The Norway-Pacific Construction & Dry Dock Co. has put in a splendid yard at Everett, Wash. I had an opportunity to visit that yard two or three months ago. It is up to date in every respect. They have invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in getting ready, hoping, of course, to get contracts from the Government for the building of ships, as well as contracts from private people. It is ready and anxious to build ships. It can get no contracts from this Government. Norwegian interests are anxious to give it contracts for several large steel ships, ships of 12,000 tons and over, costing a million and a half or two million dollars. It can not take them because it can not get a permit from the United States Shipping Board. That shipyard is idle.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator know of any good reason why these permits should not be granted?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am going to give the reasons in just a little while.

The labor of that community is unemployed, and these contracts will doubtless go to another country and the employment of other labor.

I want to read an extract from a letter that I received the other day from this company. It says:

> Our yard is now practically completed and we are in a position to take on contracts for three years' work the minute we are authorized to construct for foreign account, and, as you know, our yard will alone employ from three to four thousand men, and as we are going to give preference to returned soldiers, there seems to me to be an additional legitimate reason why the Shipping Board should act.

Talk about the necessity for reconstruction and the necessity for readjustment, where is there a better aid to readjustment and reconstruction than to permit our capital to work when it wants to work and when demands upon it are being made that it can fulfill?

Mr. President, Italy wants steel ships built. She needs as many as France. Her capital has come to our shipyards. It has sought contracts from them. They can not build for her. Why? They can not get any permit from the United States Shipping Board.

I may be wrong, but it seems to me almost criminal that our people can not take these contracts. It is past belief that any Government would deny to its labor and its capital such opportunities for employment. Contracts of a half billion dollars or more would have been let in this country for this kind of work if this policy had not been pursued.

Why does the United States Shipping Board follow this policy? Why does it deny these permits? Why does it not aid in our readjustment problems by allowing these hundreds of millions of foreign capital to come in here and employ our labor and buy our materials? Let it speak for itself. In a letter to the Commerce Committee of the Senate regarding S. 5292, "Making it unnecessary to secure permits from the United States Shipping Board for the construction of ships in American shipyards for foreign account," introduced by me, it says, through its acting chairman:

Now, listen. This comes from the Shipping Board itself; and I have the letter in my hand, dated January 18, 1919, addressed to Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, signed by John A. Donald, acting chairman. He says:

> I may say that ever since the signing of the armistice the board has been constantly giving its interested attention to the subject touched upon by this bill. Those of us who are here—

And, Mr. President, the great majority of that board is here—

> Those of us who are here are quite firmly of the conviction that permission should be granted to American yards for constuction therein of vessels for approved foreign account.

So the United States Shipping Board would grant these permits. It would remove these restrictions. Why does it not do it? Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, will not let it do it. How do I know that? In answer to my resolution, Senate resolution 389, the United States Shipping Board, called on for information with reference to these matters, submitted a report. The report is now in the hands of the Senate, Senate Document 334, that any Senator can get. The Shipping Board says, and it refers to this in the letter to Senator FLETCHER:

> On the same day war-time restrictions upon the construction of steel ships in American yards—

Referring to the date when the restrictions were removed with reference to the building of wooden ships—

> On the same day war-time restrictions upon the construction of steel ships in American yards for domestic account were removed, but the restriction upon such construction for foreign account have not been removed.

Listen!

> This restriction remains in force temporarily by direction of the President, whose delegate the Shipping Board is in the exercise of his authority.

There is the reason why the Shipping Board, notwithstanding its firm belief that these restrictions should be removed, does not remove them.

Mr. President, I shall not speculate upon why the President does not remove these restrictions. I shall not speculate as to why he prevents our people from getting these contracts and allows the contracts to be turned to foreign yards that will be competing with us not only in the building of ships but in the operation of ships in the world trade in the very near future. He has not thus far seen fit to give any reasons to us or the people for this policy.

Mr. President, we were asked to give up our just rights in the Panama Canal to help the President solve mysterious problems between this country and another country. We did it, and to this day no one knows what benefit it was to us.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In this connection, at the time that under the peculiar request of the President Congress repealed the so-called free-of-tolls law, which had been placed upon the statute books, giving the benefit of this great waterway to American ships, it was asserted that treaties which we had with Great Britain required American ships to be upon the same basis as foreign ships. The sham and the fiction in that proposition is obvious from the fact that to-day and at all times since that proposition has been made American naval vessels pass through the canal without paying toll, while the naval vessels of other nations are required to pay toll, thereby demonstrating in actual practice that they do not believe and do not put into effect the proposition that there is any treaty requiring ships of America to be put upon the same basis as those of foreign nations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My colleague is entirely right. After the armistice was entered into, and the war was practically over, Mr. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, recommended that the United States should stand back and allow other countries to have the first chance at the world's export trade in order that they may rehabilitate themselves.

That seems to be the policy of reconstruction and readjustment that this administration would follow. It does not make any difference what the party designation of the administration is, I ask is such a policy in the interest of the American people and American industry and American labor? Does it meet, can it meet, with the approval of any patriotic American?

And now, when we are confronted with the perplexing problems of peace, the President himself refuses to permit our shipyards to take contracts to build steel ships for foreign account. Foreign shipbuilding contracts are sought in American shipyards. These shipyards can not take these contracts because they can not get a permit to do so from their own Government. American shipyards are closed. American labor is idle. American resources are unused. Hundreds of millions of foreign capital wanting to come here is directed to foreign countries. Why? Because an American President, using the power given to him to carry on the war, refuses, for undisclosed reasons, to permit our people to take these contracts and build these ships. No reason is given to justify this action. None can be given to justify it.

It may be all right to try to rectify all the wrongs suffered by any country or people in Europe. It may be necessary to appropriate millions of dollars to enable the President to consummate a peace in harmony with his idealistic hopes and aspirations, but while we are doing this we have a right to ask him to have some regard for the rights and interests of our own people. Other peoples and governments are looking after their own interests. They expect us to look after ours, and our people have the right to expect and to demand that an American policy be followed, protecting, safeguarding, and promoting the rights, interests, and welfare of the American people, labor, and industries.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in reply to the distinguished Senator from Washington, he will bear in mind that my amendment is not an amendment proposing to pay $300.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I understood that.

Mr. ASHURST. I now ask unanimous consent to further perfect the amendment. I strike out the words "90 days" and insert "60 days," so that it will be only 60 days' pay. I wish further to perfect the amendment by adding at the end of the amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That payments made hereunder shall be confined solely to privates and noncommissioned officers.

I do not wish to say anything further.

Mr. THOMPSON. The two Houses of Congress have already passed a bill providing for one month's pay?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Moses	Smith, S. C.

Henderson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, so many reasons have been urged by my colleagues in opposition to the pending bill that seem to me to have no bearing whatever upon the merits or demerits of the measure that I desire to state my reasons for voting for it. I think I can do so in a half dozen sentences.

It is an opportune time, no doubt, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are a great many people in this country to-day who feel that our official charities, our national charities, are beginning and ending a very long way from home. We have given by voluntary contribution hundreds of millions of dollars to save our friends in Europe from disease and hunger. We have loaned to our allies billions of dollars for the purpose of enabling them to sustain their fighting strength during the war and to sustain their industrial fabric after the war until it can be readjusted to peace conditions. I am informed that the munition factories in France are still in operation, and that the bills are being paid with money which we have loaned to France. It is not strange, therefore, Mr. President, that the fifteen or twenty thousand munition workers who have been summarily discharged from the munition factories in the State of Connecticut should wonder why this Government should not be able to extend to them the same consideration that the French Government is extending to its war workers. If it had not been for the munition workers of Connecticut, the Germans would have been in Paris by Christmas, 1914.

We have been informed in this debate that there are two or three hundred thousand men in this country who have already been discharged from their employment and are unable to find reemployment. I know that Mr. Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, testified only a few days ago before the Committee on Education and Labor that little or nothing had been done to carry labor from a war to a peace basis; to use his exact language, he said that we were worse prepared for peace than we were for war when war was declared. This situation is to be lamented; there is no doubt about that. The lack of vision and the surplus of incompetency that has characterized the executive departments of this Government for the past six years are to be regretted; but it does not seem to me that this fact argues that Congress should abdicate its responsibilities in the premises. The fact that we have left undone in this country a great many things that ought to have been done does not argue that we should continue that policy in this country or extend it across the water.

I do not look upon this appropriation as a charity. I look upon it as a war measure. If the President accomplishes what he tells us he expects to accomplish, it will be the best investment that the United States of America has ever made. As a taxpayer, and, I believe, representing the taxpayers of this country, I shall vote for this bill because the taxpayer knows that it is a great deal cheaper to buy peace than it is to fight for it, if it can be done honorably—and there is nothing dishonorable in acting the good Samaritan.

We hope that the war against imperialism has been won. It has been a war of destruction; it has cost the allies, including this Government, more than $100,000,000,000 and more than 10,000,000 precious lives. Now, it seems to me, Mr. President, that it will be very much wiser for the United States to invest a hundred million dollars a month for the next two or three months if it is necessary to win the war that is now on—the war against anarchy and ignorance—than it will be to decline to do it until possibly our honor is again involved, for that will mean the killing of more American boys and the expenditure of billions of dollars. We have had enough of that. It seems to me, sir, that this is no time for penny wisdom. We must see this thing through, for every taxpayer in this country knows, and I think every patriot knows, that if ignorance and anarchy are permitted to throttle democracy in Europe in the next six months there will be no peace anywhere for anybody during the next 25 years. That is the reason why I shall vote for this bill.

I believe this legislation is wise from a purely humanitarian standpoint, but I also believe that it is wise as a pure business proposition. I think it is wise because I do not see how we can expect to fulfill the mission which we undertook in April, 1917, unless within the next few months we secure not only armed peace but also industrial peace in Europe.

It is all very well for the eloquent Senators who have preceded me to state their belief that we ought to have an American policy; that we ought to protect our soldiers, and so forth. So we ought, and we are trying to do it this morning. We ought to protect our civil liberty in this country, as was so ably presented by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] yesterday. All these things we ought to do, but in doing them why should we postpone a simple proposition like that presented by the President of the United States, calling for what I believe to be a wise investment, an insurance that within a reasonable time we may expect to have industrial peace and law and order established in Europe, without which the future of this country might be such that I dare not attempt to describe it?

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has introduced an amendment, the purpose of which is well enough, but the effect of which will be to postpone ultimate action upon this measure beyond the time when it will do any good. He ought to know that, if it is adopted, it will not in any way change the personnel of the men who will administer this fund. The President will nominate Mr. Hoover as the chairman of the commission, and he will either be confirmed or this bill will never become a law. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment. I believe that time is the essence of this transaction if it is to be of any benefit to this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, like other Senators, I have had much difficulty in making up my mind as to how I should vote on this measure. When it was first submitted to the House, indeed after it came to the Senate, my heart prompted me to support it because I confess that I looked upon it more as a matter of charity than in any other light, and I knew there must be great suffering in Europe; but the discussion of the matter since it has come here has disillusioned me. Now, its proponents all claim, I believe, that charity has nothing to do with it; that we are about to vote this appropriation upon the request of the President, because he has stated that this action is necessary in order to enable him to carry out his plan as the representative of this Government at the peace conference.

I have read his reasons, if they can be called such, as stated in his cablegram, in which he says that food is now the key to the situation, because Bolshevism can be stopped not by force but by food. I take it, therefore, that this is the object he has in asking for this appropriation. It seems to me scarcely thinkable that any amount of money which we might appropriate now would stop Bolshevism, because, if it is simply a proposition to buy off the people who are against law and order, the money which they thus easily obtain will have to be duplicated many, many times, and we shall get no such results as are anticipated, and this appropriation is but the beginning of a scheme involving the expenditure of billions of money.

Since the war began I have voted, as other Senators have, for very many measures on the ipse dixit of the President. We have felt in our hearts that many of those measures were wrong, and I submit that experience has demonstrated that we were right; but yet we were told they were necessary to win the war, and therefore we were practically coerced into supporting measures which our judgment told us were not proper ones to pass.

The President has said several times that the war is over, and yet he now presents this proposition to us as a war measure. We knew nothing about what the policy of the President was when he started on his self-appointed mission to Europe. We have learned nothing authentic about it since. We know more about royalty in Europe than we ever heard of before, and of the overloads of generosity to our President and his estimable wife, but we know nothing of the peace plans. We read now and then of secret conferences that are being held by our President and certain prominent people in Europe, but "open covenants openly arrived at" have not been obtained and, it seems to me, have not even been seriously attempted; so that the Congress of the United States knows absolutely nothing about what policy the President may have in mind. It is this doubt which causes me to hesitate in this matter.

It is claimed that he is over there for the purpose of setting up governments. There are many eminent Senators in this body who believe that that is a proper thing to do. I have never had any sympathy with that idea myself, Mr. President, because I have felt that our business after destroying the Imperial German Government was here at home, and that we could not afford to set up governments all over Europe, doubtful experiments, to be maintained by armed forces supplied by citizens of the United States. I think it will develop into a very bad policy; and yet, if we are to believe the press and the advocates and the supporters of the President here, that is one of the things the President is trying to do.

It was reported that he was passing over Europe for the purpose of creating public sentiment in Europe in favor of his ideas of what ought to be done at the peace convention. I have forgotten who it was, but one Senator expressed my thought, on yesterday, I think, when he asked, What would we think here in the United States if that conference had been called at Washington and peace representatives of France, Japan, and England were here traveling through our country addressing our people for the purpose of creating sentiment in favor of such propaganda as they might see fit to inaugurate? I have felt that it was the duty of our representative—because we have only one—to go to Europe to confer with the representatives of the allied nations, not to confound them by inciting public opinion against them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Did you notice this morning in the press—I have not the paper with me, but Senators will recall its glaring headlines in the Post—where it was stated "Wilson, France, and England" are conferring over the disposition of Russia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNSEND. In a moment. Think of the proposition for a minute. An individual is named—not the United States but "Wilson," as the paper calls him, in conference with France and England! Our one representative over there, whose plans and policies are unknown to the people of the United States, suggests this doubtful proposition, as it seems to me, which proposes to appropriate $100,000,000, not for charity, not to relieve the suffering people of Europe because they are suffering, but to be used as a bribe for the purpose of buying Bolshevists into good behavior.

Now I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in justice to history, and conscious of the very eminent fairness of the able Senator from Michigan, replying to the observation which attracted the Senator's attention, asking what our people would think if some foreign representative came to us to inculcate his doctrines, I beg to call the eminent Senator's attention to the fact that we sent Henry Ward Beecher, one of the eminent divines of the earth, to England, and there he espoused and presented the cause of our Republic and the doctrines of Mr. Lincoln to the people of England, with a view of avoiding their sympathy with those who were seeking secession and destruction of the Republic.

I also invite my eminent friend to recall that Kossuth, of Hungary, came to this country, and was entertained, as he should have been, to present the doctrines of liberty for people rising against an imperial despotism, and we received him gladly, as I am sure any other delegate upon a similar mission would be received.

I merely ask my able friend, knowing his eminent fairness and scholarly attainments, if he does not recall those illustrations as very pertinent to the occasion?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do, Mr. President, now that the Senator has brought them to my mind; but the cases are not parallel. Beecher was sent to a neutral nation that was not interested in a controversy between the two divisions of the United States. It was perfectly proper to create sentiment in favor of a proposition on the part of neutral nations; but France and England and Italy are vitally interested in the questions that we are interested in, and have all selected delegates to meet in common council to represent their Governments. In my judgment, it is entirely improper for a representative of this Government to that conference to try to influence the constituents of the representatives at the peace conference of a foreign country. The cases are entirely different.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish unduly to criticize the President, although now it seems to me the ban is off, and we as a Congress ought to act according to our judgment. We have a right to demand that there shall be light thrown upon this subject before we vote these hundred million dollars. The Senator from Connecticut says it is a cheap investment to appropriate $100,000,000 for the purpose of establishing law and order in Europe. Oh, indeed, it would be. If that were assured, if that were the probable outcome of the investment, I should say by all means it was the proper thing to do. I feel sure it will not even contribute to that result.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator desires to be fair in stating the proposition of the President. As I understand, the proposition of the President resolves itself into two heads. First, he states that there is a necessity for food, there is starvation, there is want, in Europe. He makes that proposition. He is there. He has made an investigation. On the question of charity alone, it seems to me, we should respond to that. But he goes further. Outside of a question of charity, the self-interest of the world demands that a condition of starvation, of lack of food, of want, should be eliminated, because if it is not, the people who are in want, and starving, and lack food, are dangerous. They have Bolshevism. They are anarchistic. Consequently, the President submits to the American people two propositions. From the standpoint of charity this should be done. From the standpoint of self-interest alone it will be wise to make this appropriation. It seems to me that would be a fair interpretation of the President's message.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Virginia is the only proponent of the measure whom I have heard who admits that one of the objects of this bill is charity. Every other man whom I have heard—I presume there are other Senators who have said it; perhaps the chairman of the committee did, but I did not hear his statement—all of the other Senators who have spoken on this subject, in favor of the appropriation, said that it was not charity and that they would not support it if it was.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not discussing the other Senators. I am not discussing what other Senators say. The Senator was criticizing the position of the President of the United States. I say that any fair, just interpretation of his message would have two points in it. There is want, there is lack of food, there is starvation, in Europe. Charity ought to justify us in making the appropriation. But, further than that, the President takes the position that even if we did not do it for charity, wisdom, sense, and judgment require us not to have Europe in a state of starvation, because starvation produces anarchy; starvation produces conditions that are opposed to order and the best interests of humanity. It seems to me that any fair interpretation of the message sent by the President would convey those two ideas.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in the discussion of this question I have been trying to answer some of the arguments that have been presented in favor of the passage of this measure; but, as the Senator suggests, I certainly do not wish to be unfair to the President. As disclosed by his cablegram to his private secretary, Mr. Tumulty, he said this—it has been placed in the RECORD several times:

I can not too earnestly or solemnly urge upon the Congress the appropriation for which Mr. Hoover has asked for the administration of food relief. Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solution of peace. Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, has overwhelmed Poland, and is poisoning Germany.

I supposed that Germany was about as thoroughly poisoned as it was possible to imagine; and if this argument is of any effect, that you are going to stop the spread of Bolshevism—because that is the object of this appropriation, whatever the Senator from Virginia may state; the object is to bring about peace through the checking of Bolshevism, which——

Mr. SWANSON rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will ask the Senator not to interrupt me until I finish this statement—which the President states has spread over Poland and is poisoning Germany; and yet Germany is one of the parties to be considered in this peace convention. It is to make a peace growing out of the war with Germany; yet Senators admit here that no part of this money must be expended in Germany. No part of it must be expended there, but the poisoning process must be continued, for by amendment the money can not be used to check Bolshevism or to prevent starvation in the central governments. Yet, I submit, if there is any logic at all in this proposal, if there is any reason for this appropriation, some of it ought to be spent in Germany for the purpose of feeding people there and stopping Bolshevism, in order that a government may be established which can be dealt with by the United States; for whatever treaty is made affecting all the nations of Europe, it must take in those governments which will grow out of Germany when it is reconstructed.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield now for a question.

Mr. SWANSON. I was suggesting that the Senator had not entirely interpreted properly the message of the President. He says the issue in Europe is food. Lack of food encourages anarchy and Bolshevism. Now, those are the two propositions, it seems to me, from the very sentence that the Senator read from the message of the President.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will put it all in, and let the Senate and the country decide whether I am right or wrong in my interpretation.

Mr. SWANSON. Let me ask the Senator this question: If Germany is not included, the Senator can correct that very easily. If that is the reason why he does not favor it, he can very easily correct that by offering an amendment to include Germany.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I do not oppose it for that. I do not favor it at all; but I say the bill has already been amended so as to exclude the expenditure of any money in Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, or Turkey.

Mr. SWANSON. But if the Senator thinks that is wrong, he can offer an amendment to correct it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think it is wrong.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator indicate from what page of the RECORD he is reading?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am reading from page 1753. I supposed that everybody had read the President's message to his secretary. I desire, Mr. President, to have the whole of that cablegram inserted. I read only part of it. I want it all printed in the RECORD, so that the RECORD may be complete on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PARIS, January 11, 1919.

TUMULTY,
The White House, Washington:

Please convey following confidential message to Senator MARTIN and Congressman SWAGAR SHERLEY:

"I can not too earnestly or solemnly urge upon the Congress the appropriation for which Mr Hoover has asked for the administration of food relief. Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solution of peace. Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, has overwhelmed Poland, and is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food, and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance. The money will not be spent for food for Germany itself, because Germany can buy its food, but it will be spent for financing the movement of food to our real friends in Poland and to the people of the liberated units of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and to our associates in the Balkans. I beg that you will present this matter with all possible urgency and force to the Congress. I do not see how we can find definite powers with whom to conclude peace unless this means of stemming the tide of anarchism be employed."

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I also desire to insert, in connection with the reference that I made a little while ago to an article in the Post, which has just been handed me, the heading of the article in the morning Post, on the first page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Wilson, France, and England to Present League Memorials. (By the Associated Press.) Paris, January 21.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not like to stand in the Senate or elsewhere and protest against sending relief which this country can afford to send under proper conditions to distressed people anywhere. There may be some doubts as to our constitutional power to do that as a matter of charity, and yet it appeals to my heart very strongly; but the reasons which have been given in support of this proposition do not meet with my approval—scarcely any of them at all, in fact—and I do not wish to carry on further this practice or custom of voting the people's money to and conferring power upon the President simply because he demands that it be done. I want information. I think we have a right to know what is to be done with the appropriation and why and where it is to be expended. The Senate can no longer stultify itself by stifling its judgment and abandoning its prerogatives.

I could dwell to great lengths upon the financial needs of our country at this time, although I think our Government is able to grant this money if it is necessary and at the same time supply the necessities of our own people; but the fact is that we are neglecting our own home interests, and that condition will continue so long as this peace parley lasts. More than 10 weeks ago the President and his party landed in Europe. What has been done there we only know from conflicting newspaper reports. All agree, however, that our distinguished President has been royally entertained. There have been held secret conferences by separate little groups throughout Europe. Up until a few days ago, however, the conference had not been convened. During the last week meetings of an hour's length have been held almost daily. If we are to have normal conditions restored in this country, this peace question must be settled, the plans of which are entirely locked in the brain of the President, so far as our interests are concerned.

The country has a right to know what is going to happen over there in Europe, and the sooner it is known the better. When we pass a bill here at present we have to send it by special messenger across the sea over to the President, and after he has considered it in due course of time it comes back. I do not know how many emergency bills have been enacted weeks ago that have not yet been approved, but I believe there are many. The President ought to finish his business at Versailles, which is the peace treaty, settling the war with Germany, and then leave all other questions to be settled later. There is no danger of war in this country in the immediate future. The four great allied powers that were engaged in the war have the absolute control of peace and war for years, if not centuries, to come; although, Mr. President, I am not objecting to the consideration of a treaty or of a plan for a league of nations, if it can be properly drawn. I confess I do not see how one can be drawn that will be of much consequence and protect the rights of the United States, in which I am greatly interested. I do not know, but I think it is possible through months of deliberation to form an effective and safe league of nations to enforce peace, and I am favorable to it; but it will and should take a long time to get up a proposal for a league that will be recognized as safe and proper by the leading nations of the world. I want my country protected; but I protest against the United States entering into compacts which will oblige us to keep our soldiers in the Eastern Continent to defend with armed force these little experimental nations which it is proposed to set up all over continental Europe and in Asia. Those are their problems. We have problems of our own here. We have quite enough to do to solve them in accordance with our traditions and ideals. Our Government can help the world by an example of true, representative democracy here. Hasty action in these disturbed times might, and probably would, prove disastrous to the ideals of our Republic. What are the President's plans for Russia and Germany and Turkey? Should we vote $100,000,000 of the people's money to carry out those plans, which are unknown to us?

So, Mr. President, while I have arrived at my conclusion slowly, having some doubts as to what I ought to do, I am now convinced, after hearing the arguments of practically all the proponents of this measure, that it is my duty as a representative of the people of the United States to vote against this experiment simply on the request of the President of the United States, who is living and has been living for 9 or 10 weeks under peculiar environments, nobody knowing exactly what they are, but living in an atmosphere unlike our own, alienated to some extent from the very pressing needs which are here at home.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I noticed in the communication from the President to the President's private secretary, in the latter part of it, it is insisted that the use of this money which is to be appropriated by the bill if enacted, with other funds contributed by the allies, is the only means of stemming the tide of anarchism. I wish to ask the Senator in view of this whether there is any such tide in this country, if we are to take the word of certain distinguished gentlemen about our own domestic affairs. Last fall, some time before the President left our shores, he said in a letter to the central committee of his party in the State of New Jersey that he hoped he would be able when the men were mustered out of the service to see that they did not return to economic serfdom in this country. Normal Angell, an Englishman of some note, a publicist, a short time before that came to this country and delivered himself of an address in New York City, in which he said that the United States Constitution was the worst constitution in the world. Louis F. Post, the Assistant Secretary of Labor, upon divers occasions has taken occasion to remark that labor was oppressed; that a laboring man had no rights in this Government; and that unless something was done an explosion would occur in our own country. What does the Senator think about these distinguished authorities, beginning with the President, as to whether we have anything worthy of attention at home, especially in view of an authority of the American Federation of Labor not long ago, wherein he said that before spring came we would have bread lines and great armies of unemployed in our own country?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I believe we are living under most serious conditions, but I am not so apprehensive as very many men are over the future. I confess that my mail contains many letters which are quite disturbing. A great many demands are made which it seems to me are unwarranted, and there is a general feeling on the part of a great many people that many of the returned soldiers are going to be a source of great disturbance to the country.

I do not believe these soldiers are now being treated properly. Many of them are held in cantonments and camps when they ought to be at home. Many are denied opportunities to engage in profitable employment by being held in the Army when they are no longer needed. I am told, although I have not been able to demonstrate its truth, but I confess I have some faith in the statement, that there are certain officers in the Army who like to have their units retained. These officers never had so prominent a position before in their lives and they would like to keep their men in line as long as possible. Some of the soldiers are almost in rebellion because of the treatment they have received and are now receiving. Their allotments to their loved ones have not been paid, their mail does not reach them, and their requests for discharge are contemptuously treated.

But, Mr. President, I have such faith in the boys who constituted our Army, that did so much to save the world from Prussian despotism, that I believe they are going to constitute the balance for law and order in this country after the war is over and the works of peace are again resumed. I know how many of them feel about the conditions to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has referred. They have seen cantonments built throughout the country. They have seen the loafing on the job, the attempts to wrest money from the Treasury without rendering compensation in return. They have suffered from the profiteering of capital and labor and know where the blame lies. Their memories will be long, but their patriotic loyalty will also be long and true. Our soldiers feel deeply, but we can trust them. I do not like, however, to see indignities heaped upon them. I have protested against them, with little avail, and I will not in time of peace grant further autocratic power to this administration. We have on these shores stupendous tasks to perform. We have delayed already too long. I will not by vote of mine defer action on the domestic problems which require solution in order that our time and Treasury may be devoted to the setting up and maintenance of governments for a score, more or less, of fleeting revolutionary nations in Europe and Asia.

Domestic problems, I say, require our attention. We are not giving it to them. There is a difference between the President and his Cabinet or subordinates here on certain great propositions, and, of course, they can not be settled until the President settles them. These things ought not to be in this critical hour when there are so many possibilities of danger arising on every hand; patriotism at home should be encouraged, because we need it quite as much now as we have needed it heretofore. There was no chance to make a mistake then. The country must be preserved. The flag was endangered and each must do his duty; but now after the war is over the people who fought that war are not going to be content with petty politics or with following out the dreams of some ambitious man or men who may seek notoriety and greater influence through doubtful experiments.

Mr. President, I have given as much attention to the subject as I could. I was prejudiced, as I have said, in favor of the bill when it was first presented and felt that I would vote for it, but the facts disclosed in the Senate discussion have convinced me that my duty to my country now compels me to vote against it.

I hope the Senator from Arizona will not attempt to complicate this measure by insisting upon an amendment which might possibly receive some votes if it stood on its own bottom and was not tied up with a measure that some of us at least feel in conscience bound to oppose.

Mr. LENROOT. I send to the desk a cablegram which I received day before yesterday, and I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PARIS.

Senator IRVINE LENROOT,
United States Senate:

Leaving for Scandinavia to-morrow in charge of northern relief. Everything depends upon Senate passing $100,000,000 appropriation to provide food and prevent starving people from lapsing into bolshevism. Conditions extremely critical. Please help.

MAGNUS SWENSON.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the sender of this cablegram was until he left for Europe the food administrator of the State of Wisconsin. He is a man of very excellent judgment and of very high standing.

Mr. President, I expect to vote for this bill not as a charity, because I do not believe that Congress has any constitutional right to vote money for pure charity. I shall vote for it because I believe that the appropriation of this money will bring a resulting benefit to the people of the United States commensurate at least with the money that is involved.

Much has been said concerning the constitutional authority to appropriate this money. We will all concede, I think, that Congress has no right to appropriate money out of the Public Treasury for a pure charity, but I think we must also all concede that if there be a benefit flowing to the people of the United States from the appropriation of public money it is within the constitutional authority of Congress to make that appropriation.

A distinction should be made between the right of Congress to legislate upon the rights of persons and the right of Congress to legislate with reference to taxation and the appropriation of money. Our right to levy taxes is conferred by the Constitution, and the purposes for which we may do it is to pay the debts and promote the general welfare of the people. We have the constitutional right to appropriate money for any purpose that it can be fairly said will promote the general welfare of the people.

This question has been up a number of times in the Supreme Court of the United States, notably in the sugar-bounty cases, arising out of the act of 1890, in the case of Field against Clark, but the constitutional question was not decided.

Later the question came up with reference to the right of Congress to appropriate money to pay the claims of those who had incurred losses growing out of that legislation. That question came before the Supreme Court of the United States in United States against Realty Co., One hundred and sixty-third United States, and the syllabus contains this language:

It is within the constitutional power of Congress to determine whether claims upon the Public Treasury are founded upon moral and honorable obligations and upon principles of right and justice; and having decided such questions in the affirmative and having appropriated public money for the payment of such claims, its decision can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the Government.

It is true that in the opinion in that case this language is used:

It is unnecessary to hold here that Congress has power to appropriate the public money in the Treasury to any purpose whatever which it may choose to say is in payment of a debt or for the purposes of the general welfare. A decision of that question may be postponed until it arises.

I can well imagine, Mr. President, that if it were a case of a pure charity, admitted to be such, the court might hold that that was beyond the power of Congress; but if the appropriation be made because of the belief of a resulting benefit to the people of this country, thus promoting the general welfare, it is clearly within our constitutional authority. I admit that Senators who regard this as purely a charity are correct in their position that so regarded it is not within our constitutional power, but those of us who believe that there is a resulting benefit to the people of this country can vote for this bill, satisfied that it is within our power.

In my view the appropriation of this $100,000,000 or the appropriation of any other sum of money will not cure bolshevism. We can not cure bolshevism with food; we can not destroy bolshevism with bullets. But the appropriation of this money will do this: The distressed and starving peoples of these liberated countries, so long as they are starving, are not in a position to think and to reason concerning any stable form of government. They go with Bolshevists not because of any theory of government which the Bolshevists have but because of that portion of the Bolshevist theory, direct action and destruction and taking from those who have and giving to those who have not.

So long as peoples are starving and hungry, whether we call it bolshevism or not, we will have riots, we will have disorder; they will get food wherever they can get it; they will take it from those who have it; and they will not be thinking about what is the best form of government for their country. Relieved of that condition, those peoples then will begin to think of what form of government is best for them. Our hope is and must be that when the peoples of these liberated countries have an opportunity to think and to reason they will establish such a government as will be permanent and that will be for their own welfare.

I am not afraid of bolshevism being a permanent condition any more than I am afraid of anarchy being a permanent condition. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] yesterday in his very admirable address said if we must choose between the autocracy of Germany and anarchy he would prefer autocracy. That is true if we should assume for a moment that anarchy anywhere could be a permanent condition. But that is impossible. It never has been and never will be true. Anarchy, bolshevism, or whatever you choose to call it, is a temporary condition, and out of it will come sooner or later always either an autocracy or a representative government.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. At various times in the not remote past we have had bread lines in the United States. The condition was very serious in 1893 and 1894, and, as the Senator will recall, in 1913 and 1914 millions of people were out of employment, with soup houses everywhere and hunger staring everyone in the face. Was any proposition introduced into either body at that time to take money out of the Treasury with which to relieve that situation?

Mr. LENROOT. No; not that I know of.

Mr. WATSON. If that condition should come again, as we now have it freely prophesied throughout the country, and some proposition were to be introduced here to relieve the situation by taking money from the Treasury, would the Senator feel free to support it?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say in reply that depends entirely upon the conditions which then exist. I can conceive that I would be willing to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States for such a purpose, and I believe the Senator would, too. But that is not the question before us now.

The question before us now is whether the use of this money will assist in the formation of stable, permanent, well-organized governments and thus assist an earlier conclusion of the peace conference. Will any Senator say that if the liberated peoples in the Balkans, in Austria-Hungary outside of German Austria, in Poland, could have stable, organized, permanent governments the work of the peace conference would not be very much easier than it will be if chaos and anarchy reign?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think the delay in the peace conference for the last six weeks has been by reason of those conditions in the liberated countries?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not.

Mr. BORAH. What Europe is dying of is procrastination.

Mr. LENROOT. I think so.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator as to the converse of that proposition? Does he think the condition he is so aptly describing here is in any part due to delay in arranging the terms of a peace treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it very likely may be due in part to that, because I think the sooner a conclusion can come at the peace conference the sooner we may look for permanently organized governments over there.

But to return to my proposition, every Senator will admit, I think, that if we can hedge Germany about with organized government, either such as our own or upon the representative principle, the German menace for the future is very much lessened; and, after all, it is our business primarily at the peace conference to secure such a treaty of peace as will, so far as possible, remove for all time to come a repetition of the German menace that has confronted the world. So if feeding the hungry of those peoples will enable them to think about forming a permanent system of government that will stand, then food has assisted materially in bringing about a treaty of peace which will be permanent and one which may be ratified.

In addition to that, we have this proposition: The United States, we believe, is the best and highest form of government existent. We hope that these peoples over there will look sooner or later to the United States as their pattern and example for the formation of governments of their own. I think, Mr. President, with the action taken upon this bill, feeding the hungry, enabling them to think upon the kind of government that they shall have, they will be much better disposed toward this country that has done this thing and much better disposed to look upon our form of government as the most desirable than they otherwise would be.

Bolshevism, as I said a moment ago, to my mind is not a permanent menace. It can not long exist. I have in my hand an address delivered by Lenine, the premier of the so-called Russian Soviet republic, delivered a few months ago. Lenine is not an ignorant man. He is a very able man. He clearly recognizes in this address the difficulties which now confront his theory of government. In this address, after describing the first two stages of the Russian revolution, he says:

We are now in the third stage. Our gains, our decrees, our laws, our plans, must be secured by the solid forms of everyday labor discipline. This is the most difficult, but also the most promising problem, for only its solution will give us socialism. We must learn to combine the stormy, energetic breaking of all restraint on the part of the toiling masses with iron discipline during work, with absolute submission to the will of one person, the Soviet director, during work.

Here he recognizes that the government which they now have can not last long without a dictatorship. He proposes in the quotation which I have read a dictatorship only during work, and would permit them to go on unrestrained by any law, human or divine, when they are not at work.

A little later in the same address he uses this language:

The more firmly we now have to advocate a merciless and firm rule and dictatorship of individuals for definite processes of work during certain periods of purely executive functions the more diverse should be the forms and means of mass control in order to paralyze every possibility of distorting the Soviet rule in order to repeatedly and tirelessly remove the wild grass of bureaucratism.

In the same address he uses this language:

It is not hard to see that during any transition from capitalism to socialism a dictatorship is necessary for two main reasons or in two main directions. In the first place, it is impossible to conquer and destroy capitalism without the merciless suppression of the resistance of the exploiters, who can not be at once deprived of their wealth, of their advantages in organization and knowledge and who will, therefore, during quite a long period inevitably attempt to overthrow the hateful—to them—authority of the poor.

I was very much surprised, and I am sure Senators will be surprised if they have not already read this address, to find this socialistic Lenine in Russia advocating the application in Russia of the Taylor system of efficiency in the United States. I read as follows:

The Russian is a poor worker in comparison with the workers of the advanced nations, and this could not be otherwise under the régime of the Czar and other remnants of feudalism. To learn how to work, this problem the Soviet authority should present to the people in all its comprehensiveness. The last word of capitalism in this respect, the Taylor system, as well as all progressive measures of capitalism—combine the refined cruelty of bourgeois exploitation and a number of most valuable scientific attainments in the analysis of mechanical motions during work, in dismissing superfluous and useless motions, in determining the most correct methods of the work, the best systems of accounting and control, etc. The Soviet republic must adopt valuable scientific and technical advance in this field. The possibility of socialism will be determined by our success in combining the Soviet rule and the Soviet organization of management with the latest progressive measures of capitalism. We must introduce in Russia the study and the teaching of the Taylor system and its systematic trial and adaptation.

This means, Mr. President, that Premier Lenine clearly recognizes the difficulties which confront his system of government, difficulties which can not be overcome, because the Soviet system of government, even in its ideal form, is only one step removed from a pure democracy, and a pure democracy is absolutely impracticable for any nation. As I said, he recognizes that there must be a dictatorship under his proposed system, and a dictatorship never has endured and never will endure for any great length of time resting upon the consent of the people.

So it seems very clear to me that the Bolshevist system of government, if it can be called a system, is doomed to failure. If it shall make progress in the United States, the cause will not lie in Russia or any European country. If a time shall ever come when we shall go through in the United States a temporary stage of bolshevism, the fault will be our own because the remedy lies with us, and in an ever-increasing degree, in assuring the producer a greater share of that which he produces. If bolshevism is a menace to any of the European countries, it is not because of its origin in Russia, but it is because the conditions in the countries themselves have become intolerable and should be remedied by the governments there.

Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say it, the pomp and ceremony that is daily attending this peace conference in Paris, in my judgment, is doing almost as much to feed bolshevism as food can do to prevent it. The occurrences at Buckingham Palace a short time ago, with dinner plate costing $15,000,000, the ostentatious display, the bowing and scraping, the emphasizing of class distinctions over there, I say, Mr. President, were most unfortunate at this particular stage in the history of the world. I am sorry that President Wilson when he went to Paris did not stay there and attend to the stupendous work—the important work—in hand.

True, the governing sovereigns of those countries have been showing President Wilson honor, but it is unfortunate, Mr. President, when millions of people are hungry and starving that all this pomp and display should be daily going on, emphasizing to them that here is a class that has much and here is a class that has nothing. I hope that during the balance of this peace conference all the negotiations may be conducted at Paris, and the less of this display in the future the better prospect there will be for a successful peace conference.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill for the reasons that I have given. I believe that it will assist in more quickly securing stable and more permanently organized governments of these liberated peoples. That being so, I believe it will assist the work of the peace conference if they can be assured that Poland is not only to be free but is to have a stable government, and so as to the different peoples of Austria and Hungary and the Balkan States.

So far as Russia is concerned, I am frank to say that, in my judgment, the Russian people must work out their own salvation. We can not cure the condition in Russia by force from without. We shall only feed the condition there if we attempt that. In Russia they will in time, as well as in these other countries, themselves evolve, through evolution and not through continued revolution, a stable government; but if we are to go in there with force we shall drive those Russian people together, and they will look upon this, the greatest democracy in the world, instead of being a government to pattern after, as one to avoid. Their only alternative, then, will be to go back to some form of autocracy.

In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to say that I hold in my hand a pamphlet which came to me yesterday—I presume it came to all of the Senators—entitled "The Russian democracy in its struggle against the Bolshevist tyranny," by Col. Vladimir I. Lebedeff, former secretary of the navy in the Russian provisional government and member of the all-Russian constituent assembly. He uses this language:

> We may truthfully say that in the liberated regions of Russia bolshevism has ceased to exist. Only an insignificant minority of workingmen still clings to it secretly. And this can be understood. The ideology of bolshevism has long been cast aside by the workingmen themselves at all labor conferences and by the socialistic parties, which lead the labor movement in Russia. The present-day bolshevism preserves its power only by the fact that while pretending to benefit the working class it gives the small minority which supports it the privilege of idleness, high salaries, and other advantages of the leisure class. Having printing presses at their disposal, the Bolsheviki issue enough paper money to be able to bribe their supporters as well as their soldiers.

In passing, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to another paragraph in this pamphlet. The writer, after speaking of the operations of the anti-Bolshevist forces upon the Volga River last July, says:

> We are certain we could execute this plan since we knew of the landing of allied troops in Murmansk and Archangel, of their battles and movements toward Vologda, and of the proclamation in Archangel by the American ambassador, Mr. David Francis, in which he called upon the Russian people to fight the Bolsheviki, pledging the aid of the allies.

I should like to inquire—but I assume it is useless to inquire—where our ambassador to Russia received his authority to pledge the aid of the allies to this movement? I merely mention that in passing.

Mr. President, in concluding I desire to say that I shall vote for the bill for the reasons which I have stated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] a short time ago stated his position on this question and condemned this bill on the ground, first, that, if it were a charity, it ought not to be granted; and, second, if it were intended to stop bolshevism, it should also not be passed by the Congress of the United States, because he did not think it would produce any such result.

Mr. President, there are ample precedents, as was shown by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] in the opening of the discussion on this bill, which have established that, even as a pure act of charity, this appropriation may properly be made. There have been any number of such precedents which have been passed by the Congress of the United States for the purpose of charitably aiding and assisting other governments. Notably, there was the one in the case of Italy, another for Venezuela, and a number for Cuba. In fact, I think the Senator from Virginia cited some half dozen instances in which the Government of the United States had passed measures of this kind purely as charity. Any Senator who desires to found his opinion and determination as to the vote he shall cast upon the pending measure can do so in view of the precedents for such action which have heretofore been established.

As has been shown by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], a position in favor of the measure may be taken on the second ground; that is, the tendency it will have to stay the spread of bolshevism—to aid in creating stable governments in Europe. There is ample reason to sustain a vote in favor of the passage of the measure on that ground.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan did not call attention to one passage in the message of the President, and I desire to read merely that line of the cablegram for the purpose of making a statement with reference to it. In that message is contained this language:

> I can not too earnestly or solemnly urge upon the Congress the appropriation for which Mr. Hoover has asked for the administration of food relief. Food relief is now the key to the whole European situation and to the solution of peace.

President Wilson is over in Europe as our agent, as the man to whom is intrusted the power of making a treaty of peace, which may or may not involve many questions which would have to be ratified by the Senate of the United States. President Wilson has been in Europe over a month; he has been looking into the conditions there, and he has come to the conclusion that this appropriation is of vital importance in the determination of the question of peace and the terms upon which peace shall be made. It is true he specifies further than that, that this appropriation is also necessary upon another ground.

Mr. President, we have spent in the prosecution of this war over $30,000,000,000. Some Senators take one position as to the reasons for which we entered the war and some take another, but unquestionably one of the causes was for the purpose of extending democratic governments through the nations of the world and invoking the doctrine which has been the cornerstone of our great Government, namely, that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed. We have spent this enormous sum of more than $30,000,000,000, and the man we sent to Europe for the purpose of closing up this war on the best terms for the United States that can be obtained, and in order to obtain the best possible terms for the objects and purposes for which we entered the war, now says that this is of supreme importance.

What is a hundred million dollars contrasted with the amount of money that we have already expended in this war? One hundred million dollars is simply one-third of 1 per cent of that amount; that is all. Is it possible that we are going to have anything modified or changed with relation to the treaty of peace from what we would want by refusing to give an appropriation of one-third of 1 per cent? Should we not give in order to aid in consummating the kind of agreement which we desire?

Mr. President, it would simply be refusing the most insignificant thing, which might cause the failure to consummate and obtain one of the most vital concessions that may be asked by us in connection with the treaty.

Looking at it from that view, knowing that the President is earnest in this matter, knowing that he has better knowledge concerning the situation than have we, knowing that he says in this very dispatch that all of the allied nations have stated that this measure is imperative, I do not see how we can decline to make the appropriation. I do not care upon what ground it is placed, whether it is that of pure charity or to stay the progress of bolshevism, or upon that higher ground which is specified in this very telegram, namely, that it is indispensable in order to make the most effective treaty of peace.

Mr. President, for these reasons I shall vote in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GAY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] are detained on official business.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, at the outset of my remarks I may relieve a little embarrassment to myself by saying that I did not suggest the absence of a quorum, so that it was not done for the purpose of calling in Senators to listen to any remarks that I might make.

Mr. President, for some two months I have felt intensely interested in the matter of providing some additional compensation to our soldiers who have carried on so successfully and to a triumphant conclusion the great war in which we have been engaged. Within a week or 10 days following the signing of the armistice I introduced a measure providing for them one month's additional pay. I did not restrict it to one month, because I felt that our men were not worthy and deserving of a greater amount, but as the situation confronted me at that time I felt more assured of success by limiting it to one month's pay. At that time the War Department was willing to approve the payment of 30 days' additional compensation.

The distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] during the present week has introduced an amendment to the pending bill providing for 90 days' additional pay, and has modified it, as I understand now, to provide 60 days' additional pay. I wish to support most heartily his amendment. I believe that those who left their homes and firesides, gave up the pleasures and comforts of their associations, and went forth to bear arms in the interest of this country, the privates, at least, for the small pittance of $30 a month, have not been amply paid for the service which they have rendered in behalf of the Republic, and that to give them an additional two months' pay is at least as little as we should do in recognition of the gratitude of the Nation and in commendation of the brave and heroic service which they have rendered.

This amendment restricts the payment to the privates and noncommissioned officers. I am anxious to see this policy successful and the allowance made upon the pending bill. So far as I am concerned, however, I would also be willing to make a certain allowance to the commissioned officers, say, an allowance of one month's additional pay. I do not quite understand why the commissioned officers, who have fulfilled their mission as a part of the war machinery of the country, who have acquitted themselves creditably and brought honor to the Nation they have represented upon the battle fields, should not be recognized in this tribute. No braver, more courageous, and loyal officers ever commanded upon a battle field.

But, as some of my colleagues seem to differ with me upon this question, I am giving my hearty support to the amendment in its present form providing for two months' additional pay for privates and noncommissioned officers.

This amendment suits me a great deal better than the one which I submitted some two months ago, and which I have been trying for the past 60 days to get enacted into law. Within a week after the armistice was signed I offered the amendment to which I have referred. I felt that we should act quickly, and that we should have the law enacted so that, as our soldiers returned and were demobilized, and as those who were in our own camps were being demobilized, they could then be paid this additional sum.

I have found from my contact with a great many discharged soldiers that they are leaving the service almost penniless. A few days ago I was riding on a train with one who told me that while he was in the service he had contributed toward the allowance for the support of his parents and in the payment of his insurance all of his salary except $7.65 per month. So Senators may well realize that that patriotic, brave, heroic young man when he returns again to private life needs a helping hand. Who should more properly extend to him that helping hand than the Government which he has been serving?

I was very much surprised in talking with him to find that upon being discharged from the service he had not been furnished with suitable equipment in the way of shoes. He had returned from overseas, where he served 9 or 10 months. He had worn there, of course, the heavy field shoes worn by those upon the battle front; he had no other shoes; and I was touched very much when he told me that when he was discharged he had only those field shoes, and that from the few dollars that he drew as his last payment from the Federal Government he had been required to expend seven or eight dollars for the purpose of purchasing shoes which were suitable to wear as he again returned to private life.

I think that when we consider the billions and billions of dollars that we have expended in connection with this war and the different steps that have been taken requiring the raising of revenue, and then consider that our success depended entirely upon our Army—that is, the ultimate success, because if we did not have these men who went to the front to do the fighting, then all of the other expenditures would have been useless and futile—we must come to the conclusion that as a recognition to our soldiers and in order that they may have a little pittance with which to attempt to rehabilitate and establish themselves in civil life, common justice and simple recognition of the performance of a patriotic, loyal, and heroic service not only justify but demand that the Congress of the United States adopt this amendment allowing these men this additional 60 days' pay.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], although I am frank to say that I would prefer to have had it proceed as a separate proposition, because I shall not be able to vote for this bill even with the amendment. Of course I realize that what the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has just said is true, that many of our young soldiers are coming home with practically no means whatever to maintain them until they can secure employment. Therefore I do not wish to be placed in the position of refusing to assist them to the extent provided by the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. But we can pass that kind of a provision here at any time without any difficulty whatever, in my judgment. I do not believe that it is necessary to tie it on to a proposition which otherwise is somewhat objectionable to me.

Mr. President, I listened with more than ordinary interest to the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], recognizing in him, as I do, a man of sound judgment and high purpose in all matters of legislation. The grounds upon which he proposes to support this bill, as I understand them, are these: That it is calculated to stabilize social and industrial conditions in the countries where we desire to found a stable government in order that we may enter into the negotiation of treaties of peace with them.

There is an argument to be based upon those grounds that it is worthy of consideration. If I could have sufficient information as to how this desirable object was to be effectuated and some reasonable assurance that the desirable result would follow, I might be able to support the measure upon that ground alone. But I venture to say that neither the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] nor the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], who supported the bill upon yesterday, would be willing to invest a single dollar as a business proposition upon any such information as they have with reference to the manner in which this fund is to be applied, or as to the probable effect it will have if applied. What I object to, so far as that feature of the argument is concerned, is that we are legislating upon a mere sentimentality, without any practical facts to warrant the appropriation.

Mr. President, we are the only department of the Government that has the tremendous power to go into the pockets of the people and lift therefrom $100,000,000. We are the only department of the Government which has had conferred upon it that almost transcendent power, and we ought not to exercise it unless we can be advised of those concrete facts which justify the application of the principle. I have listened to the debate now for two days; and if there has been a single practical proposition enunciated or stated with reference to making effective this fund, or how it is to be done, where it is to be applied, and what is the probable machinery by which it is to be made effective, I have yet to hear it. It is a serious matter to appropriate $100,000,000 in violation of the Constitution of the United States, at best, and certainly a strong and plain case ought to be made out.

Let me say to my able friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that there is another side to this proposition of feeding men without any corresponding obligation upon their part to repay or to refund, or without any corresponding obligation upon their part to become individually liable for the amount which is donated to them. I read in the Washington Post of January 19, 1919, an article entitled "Belgians won't work." I shall not read the entire article, but I call attention to a single paragraph in it.

Another grave economic difficulty arises out of what is called the unemployment fund. This was created during the war to aid the workmen, employees, and others; to enable them to subsist without having to be dependent upon the Germans. In the first instance, the fund worked advantageously; but after a while a different state of things arose. A workman who was being fed gratuitously by the relief organization received from the unemployment fund regular pay of about 100 francs a month for doing nothing; and numbers of these workmen, well content with their lot, refused to return to work.

That is characteristic of the indiscriminate, ill-advised application of charitable funds. It is a very dangerous proposition, and unless the Congress can be advised in detail as to how this appropriation is to serve these people, and do them more good than harm, and how the fund is to be returned, and security had therefor, and obligations created therefor, it is a very dangerous scheme upon which we are now entering. Do Senators really think that the taxpayers of the United States ought to enter upon the boundless sea of feeding Europe without a detailed plan and chart and specifications as to how and where we are to apply it? Where will it all end?

Mr. President, what are the conditions which confront this country at this time? Now, let us not indulge in sensational matter but state the plain facts as they are. Is there a Senator here who does not receive daily any number of letters from the ordinary business men of this country telling us that they have about reached the end in business affairs—any number of them—advising you that they are borrowing money to pay their taxes at the present time, and that they are unable to see in the future any prospects of relief, in view of the things that Congress is doing and which it is promising to do? We know that these people throughout the United States feel—all men engaged in the ordinary occupations of life, in the ordinary business walks of life—that they have about reached the limit of their capacity to take care of this burden. I am perfectly aware that that does not apply to some business men in the country, who have been fortunate in making profits out of the war, but it does apply to the vast body of business men in the United States. And remember, my friends, that when you lay this burden of $100,000,000 you lay it upon the man who is bearing all that he can possibly bear, as well as the man who is able to respond to it. It is not like going into a community and saying to Mr. Jones: "You are able to subscribe, and we ask you to exercise your charitable disposition toward the suffering people of Europe," and passing by the man who we know is unable to meet the obligations of his family and to discharge the duties of citizenship as they should be discharged in a Republic. We are now engaged in laying upon these people a burden of $100,000,000 which will affect every citizen, if not in the actual payment of taxes, in raising the prices of the articles which he must buy; and therefore, without discrimination as to capacity to respond, this burden is being placed upon those who are able as well as those who are unable and unprepared to meet it.

That is the first situation which confronts us—that is to say, the taxes which are already extraordinarily heavy in this country.

Mr. President, this may not be an argument against doing charity, but I maintain that it is an argument in favor of the proposition of doing the charitable act in a most economical and businesslike way; that if it is going to be done, in view of the situation which confronts us, we must do it with due regard for economy and the saving of every possible dollar of expense to the taxpayer.

What is the second situation in this country? We know that already riotious meetings are being held in some parts of the country. In the city of Boston the other day—I believe the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] called attention to it—we read that the city hall was stormed, and in the crowd were some 250 soldiers lately returned. We read in the Associated Press dispatch carried only five days ago from the city of New York that over 200,000 children in New York are underfed and underclothed; that in the city of Chicago more than 150,000 children are out of school because they have neither the food nor the clothes to go. We read in this same dispatch that in one little room 22 human being were huddled together, and that they did not have, as the dispatch said, sufficient clothing upon them to warrant a second-hand clothes man in paying 10 cents for all that they wore. We know that throughout the country this feeling of unrest, of dissatisfaction with these conditions, is growing day by day.

Now, my friends, in dealing with this let us not forget the psychology of the hour through which we are passing. It is different from any confronting of labor difficulties which we have ever had before in this country. The great war has shaken society at the roots, and men will not go hungry and will not beg for bread with the same docility and regard for order that they have in previous days.

Again I say, Mr. President, it may not be an argument against charity to your neighbor; but it is the most solemn and convincing argument, to my mind, that if we are going to do it, it must be upon such practical plans and terms as will warrant you in saying to the people whom you represent that every precaution and safeguard has been had to protect the situation from waste and extravagance.

I shall not stop to read the articles to which I have referred, but, by permission of the Chair, I shall insert them in the body of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK.

Aroused by reports that, with Christmas approaching, East Side children are "fainting in school and dying at home from hunger" because their parents can not pay the prevailing high prices for milk and staple foods, representative citizens Saturday organized a committee to "feed them first and investigate afterwards."

A plea that something be done for her pupils, who were "slowly starving to death," was made recently by a teacher to Joseph S. Markus, a banker, who now heads the relief organization. Mr. Markus himself visited schools, hospitals, and tenements, and Saturday issued a statement dealing with conditions on the East Side.

HUNDREDS STARVING TO DEATH.

One settlement, he said, has the names of 150 babies who, recovering from influenza, now face death from pneumonia because their parents can not buy milk needed to restore them to health. Every hospital in the district, he continued, knows hundreds more underfed children, many of whom are physically unable to continue their studies. Of his visit to one school, he said:

"In one room there were 22 children. A ragman would not have paid 5 cents for all the clothing they wore. Many had no undergarments, and those who did could hardly call them by that name. Many were without shoes and others had heelless and soleless ones.

"We learned most of them came there without any breakfast. Some kind people were giving the teacher a little money every week, and with that she purchased some milk and cereals, preparing gruel over a small stove in the room. She said with the high cost of milk now she was not able to buy much, and that several of the children had fainted right in the classroom. Others were too weak to leave home and died there. Malnutrition was the cause—starvation."

Mr. BORAH. What is the third proposition, Mr. President? It is this question of expenditures, of extravagance. The able Senator who is in charge of this bill [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] will sympathize with these remarks. No one has been more earnest and persistent in his efforts to curtail these extravagances, but they are here. They continue to grow. We have now entered upon the proposition not only of enlarging many expenditures which it seemed to me was unnecessary to enlarge, but, in the face of the condition which confronts the country, of raising salaries and enlarging the debt which we are gradually placing upon the people of this country in one way and another. The extravagance of the Government—and I say this regardless of the aisle which runs between the two parties—the extravagance of the Government at this time is something which is calculated to sterilize the industry and paralyze the initiative of business men throughout the entire land. Men hesitate to venture forth into new enterprises, or to put their money out into new industry, when they see the Congress of the United States shutting its eyes to the fact that they are already loaded down with debt, and still passing extravagant measures, larger and larger in amounts, and day by day.

After this comes what we are going to ask for the liberty loan, in a few days, six billions of dollars.

So, Mr. President, everything enjoins us when we propose to do this—if we are going to do it—to be sure that we are not making mistakes, if it is possible for human ingenuity to devise a plan by which no mistakes will be made.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said yesterday that Mr. Hoover and the President were upon the ground, and they knew. Of course I eliminate the President entirely from this discussion. The President practically eliminates himself, because he says, "I indorse the demands which Mr. Hoover is making upon the Congress"; and I say to you that the evidence is in existence, if it can all be secured, which will show that this plan for feeding Europe and the appropriation of a hundred million dollars, or some amount, originated before Mr. Hoover left for Europe.

It was not a scheme which had its birth after he discovered the facts in Europe. It was a scheme originated here, and he went to Europe to discover the facts after he had originated it. The evidence is in existence that this entire matter was talked over and arranged and provided for, one of the parties even stating that the probable amount was suggested which would be called for after Mr. Hoover had visited Europe.

Mr. President, I want to say again, as I said the other day, that as for Mr. Hoover individually I have no discussion whatever. I do not care anything about him. What I am objecting to, sir, is the system, the manner in which he distributes his funds and carries on his business—the interested parties whom he permits to realize unconscionable profits.

I want to ask Senators here who are supporting this bill, Do you want the same man that administered the Food Administration here in this country to administer this fund in Europe in the same way and upon the same principles? Do you understand, sir, that these same men, or some of them, and this same policy and this same system have been transplanted to Europe, and are now going to feed the Europeans upon the same theory, upon the same line of conduct, that they have administered the food administration in this country?

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] in his speech day before yesterday said, if I understood him correctly, that the meat packers of this country did business on less profit than any other of the large business institutions of the country. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said that while their profits might be big, they only got about 2½ per cent upon a turnover. Well, Mr. President, a man operating in a monopolistic field may turn over his capital ten times without any risk whatever of losing anything; but what has that to do with the fact that after he has turned it over as often as he can, his profits are so enormous as to stagger even the most liberal in regard to such matters.

I want to read some figures which I did not have with me the other day, but which I have here now, and I do it because these are the sums which are made under the advice and by the consent and authority of the men who wish to administer this fund. I claim that when I go forth to do charity with another man's funds I should protect him to the extent of demanding not only honesty—and I am willing to concede that to Mr. Hoover—but a plan which will not permit, even under the cover of honesty, the gathering of unconscionable profits from a charity fund.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to recall to the mind of the Senator that during the administration of Mr. Roosevelt, and before the creation of the Department of Commerce, Mr. James R. Garfield, who was the Commissioner of Corporations, was assured by the packers that their profit upon their sales was something like 2 per cent or a little over, which Mr. Garfield accepted and announced to the country, all unconscious of the fact that the 2 or 2½ per cent represented merely a turnover, and, as the Senator says, these turnovers occur at the rate of 10 or 15 per year, the total annual profit, therefore, being many times the 2 or 2½ per cent represented to him.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator for that statement. It only shows the prolongation of the outrage that has long been practiced upon the American public.

Mr. President, in 1912 the five great packing companies realized in the way of profits $18,715,000. In 1913 they realized $20,217,000. Now, if I should say to you that these men demanded in the way of profits during the progress of this war twice the amount which they enjoyed in time of peace you would be inclined to think that they were rather exorbitant in their demands. No man ought to ask twice the profit in war that he was making in peace, when the profit which he was making in peace enabled him to gather a vast amount of wealth, as we know it had with the packers.

In 1912 and 1913 these great corporations were known as among the wealthiest in the world. They had extended their enterprise not only to the ramifications of the particular industry in which they originally started, but they had gone into a multitude of other industries; and they were considered, and indeed were, among the wealthiest corporations in the United States, and were making and had gathered that wealth and realized this fund from profits which amounted to from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000 per annum. So, I say, that under those circumstances they ought to have been satisfied with their $20,000,000. Do you not think so? When the soldier boys were being stood up in the camps, and it was demanded of them that they subscribe for liberty bonds in order to maintain the Government; when the employees in these different departments who were securing for their livelihood only about $100 a month were called to the front by the head of the department and told that they must subscribe for liberty bonds; when local councils of national defense were calling men before them and fining them the amount which the council thought they should buy; when the soldiers were going forward at $30 a month and enduring all kinds of hardships and sufferings for their country, ought not the packers to have been satisfied with twice their peace profits? But when I say to you that they were not satisfied with twice their peace profits, and when I call your attention to the fact that they made it three times, they made it four times, they made it five times the amount of their peace profits, will men still insist upon the floor of the Senate that we shall go down into the pockets of the taxpayers and administer charity under an organization which permits such profiteering?

That is what we are voting for here. This money will not administer itself. And take into consideration, my friends, that practically every dollar of the food which is purchased in this country is either owned or controlled or manipulated by these five great combinations, or the two other combinations which have had so much to do with the administration of the Food Administration.

So, sir, we find that these corporations in 1912 had a combined profit of $18,715,000. In 1917 they had a combined profit of $95,639,000. How did they get it? They got it under the administration of the Food Administration. Ninety-five million dollars; within $5,000,000 of the amount which we are going to appropriate!

This is not a party question; but I want to say to the Republicans that the voters of this country may reflect that they made a mistake last November if we are going to return, like the sow to her wallow, and surrender to the same powers which once dictated the course of the Republican Party.

Let me read now from the figures of 1918. We have only one report thus far. This is from the Christian Science Monitor, a paper recognized for its accuracy in reference to its news items:

> The earning power of the smallest of the American meat packers in the present period appears a subject of interest, for one thing because the greatest food distributors in the world to-day are, naturally, more than ever before in the public eye; and then, again, because this packer, the Cudahy Packing Co., is the first of the "big five" to report on the first year under Government profit regulation. By earning power is taken to mean the total earnings of the company, that figure which the Food Administration regulation was set to limit, that amount on which the Federal war tax will be levied. By earning power, in short, is meant, in this connection, the total profit the company made in its dealings with the public.
> This earning power of the smallest of the packers was shown in a previous article on the Cudahy annual report in these columns (Dec. 20, 1918) to be larger for 1918 than ever before. Sales of the company also were much larger than in the previous history of the Cudahy Co.
>
> Now, it may be of interest to measure this earning power of the smallest packer against the capital stock, to show what this earning power is equivalent to in terms of the common stock.
>
> The total Cudahy profits, as represented in the term "earning power" as here used, may be assumed to have been $6,000,000 in 1918. The company's net profit of $3,376,808.58, plus its big reserve of $2,785,412.78, set aside for "Federal income and war-profits taxes and contingencies," amounts to more than $6,000,000, but that round figure may well be taken as representative of the year's total profits or the company's earning power. The capitalization is $20,000,000, divided into $2,000,000 of 6 per cent preferred, $6,550,500 of 7 per cent preferred, and $11,449,500 of common stock. After paying the regular dividends on the preferred stock the $6,000,000 profit would represent an earning power of 47.4 per cent on the common stock.
> Now, there were two stock dividends declared by the Cudahy Co. in the last three years prior to the end of the 1918 year. The first of these was in November of 1915, amounting to $2,000,000. The second came a year later, amounting to $2,724,750. Together they amounted to $4,724,750. If these two stock dividends be subtracted from the total of the capital stock, which, of course, they helped to bring to its present figure, this leaves a balance of common stock of $6,724,750. If the 1918 earning power of the company, namely, at the rate of $6,000,000, were to be computed on the common stock remaining after that portion representative of stock dividends were deducted, it would be equivalent to an earning power of 80 per cent.
> Should it be remarked that it is unusual to compute earning power in the sense used against the common stock, because the common stock does not share in such earning power, but only in what remains after Federal taxes are paid, which makes a large deduction from gross earnings, it may be said that this is perfectly true as far as the stockholders are concerned, but the public may nevertheless be interested in such a comparison. Up to the last few years there were no large Federal taxes to make such deductions, and it is possible that within a few years more Federal taxes may be much smaller, in which case that much more of the total profits will go to the stockholders. The public, so students of the packing industry here pointed out, is naturally interested in the total profits packers make and what they may represent as measures against the ownership of the company, because the public makes those profits possible; because, one of these students has put it, "the consuming power of the public is the vital breath of this and every other great corporation."

As to what stockholders do get, after the big tax reserve has been subtracted from profits, leaving net profits of $3,376,808.58 to be computed against the capital stock, the rate of earnings on the common stock is 24.44 per cent.

Then, again, as to the deduction of the amount of stock dividends from the total of common stock and the calculation of rate of return on the remainder. Stock dividends have been a favorite device of big corporations to make their profit look small, and a word in general about the usual packer stock dividends will perhaps not be amiss.

A stock dividend represents capitalized profits. It represents money made by the company, over and above cash dividends paid, which remains in the business in the form of surplus, and of which stockholders are given ownership through the issue of so much new stock free to them. This new stock, of course, increases the company capitalization by that much. Since a concern's rate of earning is based on the company's capitalization, particularly on its common stock, given a fixed amount of profits, the rate of earning will appear high or low, according as the amount of the common stock is small or great. For instance, Morris & Co., another of the packers, still retains a capitalization of $3,000,000, though the business is worth many millions more than that, and the company is considerably larger than the Cudahy company. If Morris & Co. made no more profit than Cudahy did in 1918, still it would show more than 100 per cent profit on its capital stock, though the smaller Cudahy company, with a larger capital stock, evidences a very much smaller rate of earnings. Hence a stock dividend, by enlarging the amount of the divisor in the fraction, to wit, the capitalization, may have a decided influence on the aspect of profits.

If the two stock dividends of the Cudahy Co. previously referred to be deducted from the common stock, and the rate of return to stockholders is calculated on the basis of the 1918 "net profits"—that is to say, $3,376,808.58, the amount available for dividends and surplus after provision was made for war taxes, etc.—it is noted to be 41 per cent. The rate of return on the common, without the stock dividend deduction, has already been observed as 24.44 per cent.

Not every stock dividend may be subject to criticism, as, for instance, where a concern has been making reasonable profits and turning back a portion of them into the business, eventually to set up this portion of past reasonable profits into common stock. In the case of several of the meat-packer stock dividends and of the Standard Oil stock dividends, there has been a suspicion on the part of the public that the profit there reposing represented, in the aggregate, an undue amount.

The Cudahy Co. in 1918 showed the largest earning power, as heretofore defined, in its history. Its net profits were larger than in any previous year with the exception of 1917. The company has had some hard sledding in several past years. The Cudahy profit figures are of interest, now and for the future, in the view of local students of the industry, in regard to the Cudahy Co., and more particularly in regard to the earnings of the leaders of the "big five," whose sales and profits run much higher, indeed, than those of the last of the quintet.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to suggest to the Senator, in reference to the Christian Science Monitor and these figures, that the testimony before the Agricultural Committee shows that the packers are spending $1,000,000 a month advertising in the papers of the country, a large part of it being advertisements of their small profits, but the Christian Science Monitor does not receive these advertisements, I understand.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another feature of this administration. I read from a letter from Alfred H. Benjamin, of New York, under the date of January 20, 1919. He says:

I represent one of the largest independent packers, operating plants in Argentina and Uruguay during the last 20 years, who have no interest at all with the Chicago packers.

We have been very important factors in reducing the cost of living in this country at a time when it was badly needed. We have been the largest importers of fats for the independent soap makers of this country, but owing to an embargo that was placed into effect on the 13th of May we were precluded from bringing in such fats as required by the soap makers, on a statement of the Food Administration that there was ample fat in the country. Notwithstanding the appeals of the independent soap makers of this country, this embargo was kept on.

In the meantime the market advanced 25 per cent and the Chicago packers had ample opportunity of selling their tallow at the record prices of 20 to 20½ cents per pound. As soon as the embargo was removed the market breaks to 10 cents per pound.

Mr. President, the men who manipulated that embargo are working for the Food Administration at a dollar a year and working for the packers at $10,000 a year; and yet you ask me to take $100,000,000 from the pockets of the taxpayers of this country and administer it by the same infamous machinery. Does the President of the United States know these facts? I do not know. I know them, and it is my conscience that must be satisfied, not that of the President, in the vote I shall cast on this bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to ask the Senator whether the figures and the statistics from the Christian Science Monitor differ from the statement given in Document No. 248, at page 14, by the Federal Trade Commission with reference to the packing industry and their net profits? If the Senator has not access to that document——

Mr. BORAH. I have it, but I could not from memory now compare the figures.

Mr. FLETCHER. In this document the Federal Trade Commission say:

An exposition of the excess profits of four of the big meat packers (Armour, Swift, Morris, Cudahy, omitting Wilson as not comparable) is given in the fact that their aggregate average prewar profit (1912, 1913, and 1914) was $19,000,000; that in 1915 they earned $17,000,000 excess profits over the prewar period; in 1916, $36,000,000 more profit than in the prewar period; and in 1917, $68,000,000 more profit than in the prewar period. In the three war years from 1915 to 1917 their total profits have reached the astounding figure of $140,000,000, of which $121,000,000 represents excess over their prewar profits.

I believe that statement has been challenged, but I do not know whether the Senator has taken the trouble to verify it or not.

Mr. BORAH. I could not say as to whether those figures have been verified. I thank the Senator from Florida for putting them in the RECORD.

Mr. President, may I read another statement? I read from the testimony before the Agricultural Committee on the 18th day of January, 1919. This is the statement of the attorney who was selected by the President to investigate the condition with reference to the packers. It has not been controverted that I know of, and I presume it was under oath and the witness would be responsible. I am not certain as to its being under oath. I simply call attention to that as an incident. Mr. Heney said:

Mr. HENEY. I am telling you all that I know about it, Senator.

Along in March I was in Washington. I was summoned here by the Federal Trade Commission because I had been making public some correspondence from Swift's files, which showed that Swift had packed the Food Administration in its own interests in the Council of Defense. They had Mr. Heyl, who was the head of Libby, McNeil & Libby, which was owned by Swift & Co. Mr. Heyl was in the Food Administration directing the regulation and fixing the prices for canned goods, and canned vegetables had been under his particular direction with Libby, McNeil & Libby.

Mr. Collins, one of the most important men in Swift & Co.'s organization, was here with the Food Administration also. They were drawing a dollar a year from the Government, and Collins was drawing $10,000 from Swift & Co., and Heyl was drawing. I think, $10,000—I have forgotten the exact figures—from Libby, McNeil & Libby.

Senator NORRIS. They were with the Food Administration?

Mr. HENEY. In the Food Administration. And Priebe, of Priebe & Co., Chicago, was with the Food Administration in charge of the fixing of prices and regulations for poultry, and I think he included eggs and cheese and butter, but at any rate poultry. I am not at all certain that he had anything but poultry. I rather think it was poultry, although it may have included the other things.

I was furnished correspondence that showed that Priebe—let me go back a moment—I received complaints from small poultry concerns all over the country to the effect that Priebe was using his position to enable Swift & Co. to monopolize the poultry market and in doing so was forcing a loss upon the small poultry dealers, and they based that upon the proposition that about the middle of September, 1917, Priebe had issued an order that all poultry must be out of cold storage by December 1 of that year.

Do you know who gave Mr. Priebe authority to issue that order? The Congress of the United States by one of those glittering generalities crystalized into a statute under which a man can do anything in the world that he desires to do, and Mr. Hoover desired to do this. Now we are asked to give another unlimited, undefined grant of power—a power to do as his unbridled discretion suggests; a power under which he can permit fortunes to be made again out of the taxpayers of the United States.

They explained to me that the poultry pack of 1916, which commenced to come in in September, 1916, and to be packed, Swift & Co. disposed of practically all their holdings, and Swift & Co. are probably the largest dealers in poultry in the United States, in frozen poultry, cold-storage poultry. And Priebe handled that department for them—

Mr. Priebe handled that department for them, exercising the powers of the Government, issuing orders like a dictator, fixing embargoes, and turning loose cold-storage products according to the interests of his master. Dost thou like the picture? Are you so proud of what you have already permitted that you want to see it repeated, and repeated by your authority? Are you going to indorse such practices by your votes—under the name of Priebe & Co., a separate corporation, but the entire 100 per cent of the stock is owned by Swift & Co.

The claim was that Priebe and Swift & Co. had disposed of all the poultry; that the fresh poultry was just about to commence coming in; that Swift & Co. wanted to capture the greatest part of the pack; that it wanted to get them for lower prices than it could get them if the poultry in cold storage was not thrown on the market, and by forcing this poultry on the market it would immediately depress prices so that Swift & Co. could buy the largest part of this pack at a much lower price than it otherwise could; and that Priebe, in order to accomplish this, had put out an order that the banks should not loan over 70 per cent of the cost prices of these turkeys.

War Power? War powers used to destroy competitors and build up private fortunes. No man who has such perverted views of decency ought to be entrusted with unlimited power to deal with $100,000,000.

Senator NORRIS. He was doing that as an official of the Food Administration?

Mr. HENEY. As an official of the Food Administration. And then they came to me——

Senator KENYON. Was he at that time drawing this dollar a year here and $10,000 there?

Mr. HENEY. He was not drawing $10,000—that was Collins. Priebe was drawing $275 from Priebe & Co. and 25 per cent of the net profits of Priebe & Co., after 7 per cent had been paid on the capital stock.

Senator NORRIS. He was doing that while representing the Food Administration?

Senator KENYON. He was getting a dollar a year here, was he not?

Mr. HENEY. He was getting a dollar a year here. And that Priebe & Co. had disposed of their stock—one minute—that the banks should not loan over 70 per cent, yet there is testimony that many of the banks had loaned customers who had good credit 100 per cent on the poultry they had put in storage that preceding year.

It seems that the large packers had made a good deal of money in the poultry business the preceding year; and so the small dealers had all plunged a little on poultry that year and there was such a demand for poultry that Swift & Co. wanted to secure this pack, as much of it as it could, and at as low a price as possible.

So, on account of this order, there was great complaint, of course, made, and finally the time was extended some. But on this order that the poultry should go out of cold storage on September 1, the dealers held back on buying stocks of poultry, and naturally. So that the smaller dealers who had poultry had to get rid of it as fast as they could, and not only did it depress prices somewhat, but Swift & Co. bought up a considerable part, as shown by the testimony, of the pack of the poultry held by small dealers whenever they put it out, besides buying the greater part of the new pack as it came in.

Of course, Armour bought heavily also.

Then he describes a convention of poultry men at Kansas City in which Swift & Co. ran the convention. It throws some light on the subject, and reads as follows:

A convention of poultry dealers took place in Missouri, in Kansas City, shortly after I commenced putting out these letters publicly in Chicago. And, by the way, I put out a letter that showed how Heyl came to get into the Food Administration and how Louis Swift and the other Swifts were very active in the matter of helping him to get there, and how a man named Brooks, of Swift & Co., wrote a letter to Swift telling him how his friend Chambers was to come on here and be in charge of shipments on the railroads. He is a Santa Fe Railroad man, and Chambers was the best friend that he had in the world, and Chambers had told him that when their interests came up they could rely on him to the limit. Of course, the Santa Fe was undoubtedly anxious to have the good will of Swift & Co., who are such heavy shippers; and shortly after Chambers got here he managed it so that the Food Administration, through Mr. Hoover, asked Swift & Co. to please loan them Mr. Brooks, so that Mr. Brooks came and got on the job himself. He was one of the dollar-a-year men, I think; I am not sure about his being a dollar-a-year man.

Senator NORRIS. You mean that you are not sure he got a dollar a year?

Mr. HENEY. No; I mean that he got a little more than that.

Senator NORRIS. He may have done it for nothing?

Mr. HENEY. He may have got a little more.

So at this poultry dealers' meeting, or convention, in Kansas City a man named Lightfoot, who is in the poultry business in Missouri and has some thirty-odd plants, a very successful man, one of the most aggressive of the smaller dealers, and who tells me that Swift & Co. told him in 1905 that they were going to put him out of business if he did not sell out to them or come under their control, at the same time they told it to Priebe, and that they did put Priebe out of business in 1905—they told him prior to 1905—and he went into insolvency or bankruptcy or something of the sort. They then acquired Priebe & Co., and then employed Priebe, and he had been running that ever since, and making large profits for Swift & Co. under this arrangement now, as I told you, of $275 a month and 25 per cent on the net profits after 7 per cent had been paid on the capital.

Senator KENYON. And then the dollar a year more here?

Mr. HENEY. Yes; and then the additional dollar a year here.

Lightfoot said that what he objected to most strongly was that Priebe was demanding that these dealers should make a statement each month telling exactly how much poultry he had bought, and from whom he bought it, the price he paid, et cetera; and Lightfoot said he had succeeded in maintaining himself against Swift & Co.'s attempt to put him out of business all these years, but, with the knowledge that Priebe would have if he answered those inquiries of the Food Administration—made those reports each month—that, of course, Swift & Co. could put him out of business as soon as the war was over; that if they were to give him—Lightfoot—the same information about Swift & Co.'s business that they were attempting to get about his, that he would guarantee that he could come pretty near taking away a large part of the business of Swift & Co.; that if he could get the financial backing he could take it all away in that particular line.

Lightfoot went to a hearing of these poultry dealers—I had not seen him up to that time—at Kansas City and he introduced a resolution condemning Priebe and calling for his removal.

Senator KENYON. Asking for his removal from the Food Administration?

Mr. HENEY. Yes. And Mr. Hoover had been invited to go to Kansas City and address this convention, and he had sent Priebe there as his representative; and Lightfoot did not want to take any snap judgment—throw him out on one morning of the convention—that he intended to introduce this resolution on the following morning and press it to a vote, Mr. Priebe being there. Mr. Lightfoot made a talk in support of his motion and attacked Mr. Priebe in Priebe's presence, and accused him of using his position for the purpose of destroying the smaller dealers, of injuring their business, and aiding Swift & Co. to accomplish the monopolization of these things, and challenged Mr. Priebe to reply to it. But Mr. Priebe did not reply. And that night Lightfoot and a lot of others who were there told me the Kansas delegates were busy running around seeing everybody, sending them to vote against the resolution, insisting that they had invited Mr. Hoover there, and he had sent Mr. Priebe as his representative, and that it would not do to slap him in the face then; that if this was true, that was not the time to do it; and many of the dealers on that ground, or the representatives of the dealers on that ground, agreed to vote against it.

In addition to that, the big packers brought in 20 or 30 or more, as I recall it now, men who were under their influence—dealers, and some of their own employees—and had them pay in the $5, I think it was, initiation fee in order to be able to vote that morning; and the resolution came very near passing. I have forgotten the number of votes, but it was quite small, which it was defeated by.

And then Mr. Lightfoot after that got in communication with me. I was then in Chicago, holding these meetings and putting this correspondence forth.

When I got here to Washington on the summons of the Federal Trade Commission I was told that Mr. Hoover had complained to the President that the publication of these letters was impairing his influence and not getting the country to save food, etc., and that it ought to be stopped.

While I was here, or a day of two afterwards, Heyl resigned from the canned-goods division of the Food Administration.

Senator KENYON. Which one of the commissioners of the Federal Trade Commission took it up with you?

Mr. HENEY. All of them.

Senator KENYON. At a meeting?

Mr. HENEY. Yes; at a meeting.

Senator NORRIS. Did they order you to drop that?

Mr. HENEY. No. It seems that Mr. Hoover had gone to the President and that the President sent word over to them that he had no instructions to give in the matter, but he hoped a head-on collision could be avoided; that was the way it was put up to me.

So they wanted to know if I would talk with Mr. Hoover, and I said that I would—in their presence; and so an appointment was made, and Mr. Hoover came over and brought his attorney with him.

Senator KENYON. Who was that?

Mr. HENEY. I have forgotten his name. I think he is a Philadelphia man.

Senator KENYON. Was it Glasgow?

Mr. HENEY. Is that the name?

Senator KENYON. Yes.

Mr. HENEY. I told Mr. Hoover I thought that Priebe should be removed, and he said that he was satisfied that Mr. Priebe was absolutely all right; that Mr. Priebe had severed his connection with Swift & Co.; that he had an interest in four other concerns which had no connection whatever with Swift & Co.; that he was no longer drawing any salary from Priebe & Co., and the salary there was the smallest part of it, because he was getting 25 per cent of the net profits, which were quite large, after the 7 per cent had been paid on the capital.

Senator GRONNA. Did Mr. Hoover know that these other men—Heyl and Collins and possibly Brooks—were getting large salaries from the packers?

Mr. HENEY. Yes; because I brought that out at the public hearing in Chicago before this, Senator, and that was what brought about this condition that sent Mr. Hoover over to the President. He then told me, too, that Mr. Hoover had been indorsed by a convention in Kansas City as to his actions; as I recall it, he said "unanimously."

Senator KENYON. You mean Mr. Priebe?

Mr. HENEY. Mr. Priebe, I should say. At that time I did not know about the action of that convention, and that is the action I have been just telling you about.

I went back and investigated that, and I sent for Mr. Lightfoot to get the story, and I also took it up with Mr. Seymour Newman, who is the editor of the Chicago Produce News, and I found that the Chicago Produce News and a paper over in New York owned by the same man—not by Newman; Newman's employee, editor and manager at Chicago; this man's name I have forgotten, but he has a produce paper in New York—that he had been threatened for publishing editorials. He had been publishing editorials demanding that Priebe be removed and accusing Priebe of these things, and he had been threatened—a man had come over there from the Food Administration and said that his paper would be refused admission to the mails if he continued. I have learned that through his representative in Chicago.

Senator KENYON. How could the Food Administration deny the mails to a publisher?

Mr. HENEY. They were going to have it done through Burleson, under that law.

Senator KENYON. This messenger was not from Burleson's office?

Mr. HENEY. No. I happen to know who he was. It was Mr. Powell, of California, who was with the Food Administration.

I wrote a letter then to the owner of the paper, and Newman did not want me to—well, I wrote a letter to the owner of the paper in New York, and told him that Newman had told me that he had been approached, and asked him who approached him, and what was said, and said that if he would write me frankly and fully I would present the matter to the President; that I was satisfied that the President would not tolerate any such bulldozing to prevent a man from expressing his convictions in regard to a matter of this kind. I got a reply from him, but he did not tell me—but in the meanwhile he wrote an editorial taking back what he said about Priebe.

In this talk with Mr. Hoover I was asked if it was necessary—Hoover said all he wanted to know was that a man was crooked or not the right man for the place, and he would put him out immediately, but that he knew these other facts about Priebe. I said, "Mr. Hoover, I do not question your integrity one iota, but I do question your viewpoint not only in this matter but others," and I had in mind Joe Cotton. I questioned it very seriously, and I say Priebe is not fit for the job, and that Swift & Co. are interested in these other matters—business firms that he claims that he is interested in——

Senator KENYON (interposing). Is this Cotton the Wall Street lawyer?

Mr. HENEY. Yes. He had charge of the regulations of the packers, and whom I believe to be a man of the highest integrity but absolutely unfit, because of his viewpoint and environment, to have anything to do with regulating the packers; and that was demonstrated by the result of his regulation. I understand that he testified before a committee of the Senate that the regulations had cut the profits of the packers in half, and weeks later he got a report from the rate expert on the books, the checks of those 20 weeks' period, and the result showed that all of the packers but one were making more money up to that time, under the regulations, than they had made in 1917, and he had personally told me—Cotton had—that the profits in 1917 were "scandalous" and could not be described by any other term.

Now, I ask you from all these facts who ran the Food Administration? I ask you how and by whose consent these great profits were made? It was by consent of the Food Administration, under authority assumed by reason of the general terms of a law we passed. Shall we go further in this affair?

Mr. President, this of itself precludes my giving my vote for this bill. This same organization, these same representatives, this same system has been transferred to Europe, and they are now there to administer a charity fund made up by the taxpayers of the United States. The only people with whom they will have to deal in the purchase are the people with whom they have been dealing for the last year and a half. The people who are fixing the prices now are the people who have been fixing them for the last year and a half, and the people who will adminster the fund are the same people who have been administering it for the last year and a half.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair.) Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I know the Senator wants to be accurate, and I call his attention to the fact that they are not exactly the same people. They are not all there. Mr. Thomas Logan, who was on a salary of the packers, maintaining an expensive suite here at the Willard Hotel, and also employed by the Standard Oil Co. and other corporations and running a bureau contributing to papers and magazines, went over with Mr. Hoover and Mr. Hurley, sat in all the conferences with them, discussing the food situation at a time when he was an employee of the packers. He has returned, so that the Senator is not exactly accurate in saying that all are there.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the cables will be open to Mr. Logan in case his advice becomes necessary in Europe.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator a question before he closes his remarks?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood the Senator to say a few moments ago that there was an understanding before Mr. Hoover went abroad that this money would be asked for, and that he went abroad to gather the facts to justify asking for it. Will the Senator give us his authority for that statement?

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to take the time to read it, but I will insert it in the RECORD. If the Senator will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 20, 1919, on page 1746, he will find what I had reference to.

Mr. CURTIS. In whose speech is it?

Mr. BORAH. It is in the testimony of Mr. Taliaferro before the Agricultural Committee. The Senator will find that Mr. Taliaferro states that the packers and Mr. Hoover talked over the matter of finding a market or stabilizing prices for their reservoirs of food supplies in this country, that the subject matter was discussed, and he states plainly, it seems to me, that it was understood that the market was to be found in the European situation, and that the matter was discussed in its fullness before Mr. Hoover went to Europe at all. I can not construe it any other way.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. Will the Senator from Idaho go a step further and tell us whether during that conversation there was a discussion or an understanding that an appropriation of this character was to be asked for in order to make that market? I think it raises an extremely important and interesting question here.

Mr. KENYON. I can assist the Senator, I think, about that.

Mr. BORAH. I would be very glad to have the Senator's suggestion. I will look for the specific statement. It is here.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think the specific statement is there, but at the conference there was an agreement that this appropriation should be asked. The situation was this, according to the witnesses: Britain had ceased to buy pork products. The packers either sought a meeting with Mr. Hoover or he called them here in October, some 25 or 30 of them, including the witness. The whole situation was talked over, and the question of stabilizing the prices was discussed, so that there would be no loss to the packers, and keeping, rather, an agreement of honor that had been made between the Food Administration and the packers as to keeping up prices under the arrangements which had theretofore been made. The witness said he did not know at that time that Mr. Hoover was going to Europe, but that Mr. Hoover had now gone there, and he expected him to carry out the understanding of that meeting. That is the substance of his testimony.

Mr. BORAH. I will read from Mr. Taliaferro's testimony:

Mr. TALIAFERRO. So far I have no objections. If the present price is maintained and there are not sufficiency of orders forthcoming the packers are going to be compelled to stand the biggest loss, in my estimation, that they ever stood, and probably a great many of them will be seriously crippled.

Senator KENYON. Just what do you mean by that? Are there great quantities of meat products in the cold-storage houses now?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. At the present time the products, while ample, are pretty well taken care of by allied orders.

* * * * * * *

Senator GRONNA. In reality, there is an oversupply of meats at the present time?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. There is an oversupply immediately available for the amount of consumption that is apparent.

Senator KENYON. And if we do not get rid of that oversupply the packers are going to be in a bad way?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. They are going to be compelled to stop. We are only operating in one door and carrying it out the other. If any links of that chain is broken, the weakest one, the whole thing stops.

Senator GRONNA. Has that oversupply caused any change in prices?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Has it made any change in prices?

Senator GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. Not yet, Senator; but it is likely to make an awful change in prices if the outlet is stopped. If you dam the river up at its outlet instead of its source, you are going to have trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. You figure if this meat can be used and disposed of to the southeastern Europeans that that demand will relieve this congestion of meat and it will enable the packers to keep running and supply the demand for fresh meat in England?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It will; that is the secret of the whole thing, Senator, that the continuity of events must not be interrupted in any one particular, not from the producer on the farms to the consumer in Europe.

Senator KENYON. If they did not get the consumer in Europe and these products were thrown upon the market the consumer would get meat a little cheaper, would he not?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. He certainly would.

Senator KENYON. But you think it would make a smash among the packers?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It would make a smash among the producers and packers, too.

Senator KENYON. Both together?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. You can not pare that potato without taking off something from each fellow. Everyone will have to suffer if that happens. The apparent suffering will be, of course, on the man who owns the biggest amount of product, which will be the packer. The packer has no guaranty that this stuff he is paying 17½ cents for is going to be taken off his hands. There is no guaranty. The Food Administration has not given us a guaranty on that. They have just told us, "Go ahead. You are a patriotic bunch of fellows, and pack these hogs on the basis of 17½, and we are going to get orders for you." But they do not give us any insurance policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hoover was instrumental in giving those assurances?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I want to say one thing for Mr. Hoover; that I have been under him—in connection with the license—and I have seen that gentleman under the most adverse circumstances, the most trying circumstances, and I want to say that he is one of the grandest men I know of; that he has done more good to the producers of this country than any other man in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The packers pretty generally agree in that opinion?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I do not know. They know worth when they see it.

Senator KENYON. Was meat and money the only things he talked over with the packers?

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It has all been a matter of our risking our money against their promise of their ability to relieve us of the product.

Senator KENYON. Do you not think, now, with Mr. Hoover over there insisting on this $100,000,000, that he is keeping faith with you?

Mr TALIAFERRO. I certainly do, or I would not be buying hogs; and I will go the limit on what he says, and that is the reason I am spending my good money on hogs. I know I will lose a lot of money on it if anything should slip

I also insert in this connection the statement of Glasgow, representative of the Food Administration, in testimony before the House committee on this bill:

We also at this time, because of the stimulation of the production of hogs throughout the hog-producing sections of the country, have accumulated in the hands of the packers, by reason of the run on hogs at this particular time of the year, a large surplus that we must work off as we can to Europe, and one of the purposes of Mr. Hoover has been, if possible, to provide a safe and regular drain of such edibles as fats, oils, and cereals that we have a surplus of to Europe, with due regard to protecting our own population by holding control over the export of them.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I attach so much importance to the judgment of the Senator from Idaho that I want to be perfectly clear about it, if he is willing to make himself a little more clear. The impression that I received from his statement was that it had been prearranged that this $100,000,000 appropriation should be asked for in order to relieve the packers. I have heard here on the floor of the Senate that we should appropriate this money because of the sending of this cablegram from the President to the Acting Secretary of State, in which he points out the distress and hunger which exists in various sections of Europe and particularly among the urban population, and asks for money to be expended by him as he shall see fit, and where he sees fit to expend it. Those are two entirely different propositions. I would never in the world vote for an appropriation of $100,000,000 to enable Mr. Hoover to stabilize packing products in Europe by virtue of a preconceived arrangement. I might, in connecting the situation in Europe with the war, be persuaded to vote for the appropriation upon the theory the President puts it. I would like to know what is the deliberate judgment of the Senator from Idaho upon those two propositions?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Pennsylvania is an able lawyer and a sound judge of evidence. Let us review briefly, therefore, the facts and circumstances which warrant the conclusion I have drawn. First, let it be remembered that men in the employ of the packers, drawing large salaries from the packers, were in control of matters in the Food Administration having particularly to do with the packers' interest; that upon the signing of the armistice the packers were left with a large food supply on hand which they had acquired during the war; that if a market was not found for this food they stood to lose a large sum of money, as prices would fall and they would have to sell on a falling market; that the point, therefore, was to find a market and thereby stabilize prices, and in this the packers were supremely interested; to this end a conference was called between the packers and Mr. Hoover, and the entire subject matter was discussed, although we have not the details as fully as we should like; shortly after the conference the newspapers carried the statement that Mr. Hoover was going to Europe to look after the food situation and might become the food dictator of Europe; that on this trip to Europe with Hoover, sitting in with him and advising about the situation, were men in the pay of the packers; that within less than a week after Mr. Hoover arrived in Europe, and before he could have surveyed the situation, before he had been outside of Paris or London, the newspapers carried back here, in substance, his plan; then came his demand for a hundred million dollars; this was followed by a telegram from Mr. White, a member of the peace commission, urging a hundred million dollars more and referring to the fact that we had large food reservoirs in this country, the prices for which should be stabilized; that afterwards Mr. Glasgow, representative of the Food Administration, stated specifically that the packers had accumulated large supplies of pork, and that it was necessary to work this off as we could to Europe, and that that was one of Mr. Hoover's purposes; that Mr. Taliaferro, representative of the packers, testified before the committee that in demanding this hundred million Hoover was simply keeping good faith with the packers, or, in other words, carrying out the understanding, express or implied. Add to this the fact that we went in search of an opportunity to expend this money, and did not wait for the petitions or pleas to come from the distracted countries. Others may take what view they will; I can not close my eyes to such a set of facts, to my mind intolerable and indefensible.

Mr. KNOX. Can the Senator from Idaho tell me whether or not it is the same evidence upon which the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] made the statement day before yesterday that a part of this money was to be used for this purpose?

Mr. BORAH. It is part of the same evidence.

Mr. President, I can not recall the witness's name, because I am not a member of the committee, but there was a witness who appeared before the House committee several weeks ago and testified with reference to this reservoir of foodstuffs which are on hand. I can not recall the witness's name, but as to the necessity of taking care of it and to avoid loss upon the part of the packers——

Mr. KNOX. To what Mr. White did the Senator refer?

Mr. BORAH. I referred to Mr. White, the member of the peace commission.

Mr. KNOX. Can the Senator indicate where that cablegram can be found?

Mr. KENYON. I will say that it can be found in the House hearings. It is the cablegram to Senator Lodge. It is not all there, but the portion the Senator from Idaho referred to is there.

Mr. SMOOT. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator speaks of the food reservoir, and from his remarks I judge that the food in that reservoir in France belongs to the packers. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BORAH. In France?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know where it is located. It is supposed to belong to the packers wherever it is located.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that from all the testimony we have had that I have heard the food products in France that are to be drawn from belong to the United States. The packers have been paid for every pound of it, and it is there now in great quantities. It was sent there for the purpose of feeding the Army, thinking that the war would go on for months and months longer. The selling of that product can not give the packers any benefit whatever.

Mr. BORAH. Neither is it necessary to appropriate $100,000,000 to get it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is another question. All I wanted to know was whether the packers had over there products which were not sold and paid for. In that case I certainly would not vote a single dollar to purchase the products of the packers that were over there and not liable to be used because of the Army returning home. But I understand the Government of the United States has paid for every pound of meat products, and every pound that is now in France has been purchased from the packers.

Mr. BORAH. That may be true, but we are not appropriating $100,000,000 to get that food supply.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say, if I understand the situation aright, the food supply is to be bought by a portion of this appropriation.

Mr. BORAH. Bought of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; not only the food supply we have in France, but the millions of suits of clothing and all the acres and tens of acres of trucks and automobiles.

Mr. BORAH. You are not going to feed those to the Bolshevists?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I will say to the Senator that those things are there, and they are to be sold by the United States.

Mr. BORAH. But that has nothing to do with this fund whatever. Let us not mix up automobiles and trucks with pork.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply say that we have pork there in great quantities. We shipped over 2,500,000,000 tons of beef for the feeding of our Army. We have lard and lard products in large quantities, and we have all manner of food provisions there for the Army. They are not to be used, and can not be used, by the time the Army is supposed to leave France, and they have got to be sold. Whether they are sold for this purpose or some other purpose, they have to be sold, and whatever we get out of them, of course, will go into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I might inquire——

Mr. BORAH. I shall yield in just a moment. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah what construction he places upon this:

Mr. TALIAFERRO. It has all been a matter of our risking our money.
Senator KENYON. Do you think now, with Mr. Hoover over there insisting upon this $100,000,000 appropriation, that he is keeping faith with you?
Mr. TALIAFERRO. I certainly do.

What construction does the Senator from Utah place upon that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was not discussing the question as to whether or not they had an agreement. I asked the Senator the question if he knew whether the packers had any meat products over in France that were unsold? I understand they had no reservoir of food in France, and that the only meat products in France, which are held in any quantities at all, are either owned by our own Government or by the English Government or by the French Government.

Mr. BORAH. That is veering away from the proposition which I was discussing. I say that the evidence is ample to satisfy any reasonable mind that this plan to appropriate money to feed the people of Europe resulted from an interview and conference with the packers of this country who wanted to get rid of their extraordinary food supplies that were on hand.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator from Idaho see that exactly the same result would be accomplished; that is, the maintenance of the prices of foodstuffs? Suppose the Government has—that seems to be a disputed matter, but the papers have so stated it—$55,000,000 worth of foodstuffs in Europe; suppose it belongs to the Government, and we take $55,000,000 of this appropriation and pay it back to the Government for the food we already have there at those prices, the result is just the same; the prices are maintained, and the packers are benefited accordingly, although in that event the bill ought to be changed so that it would simply be a donation of this food which we have accumulated instead of an appropriation.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I do not see any reason for appropriating $100,000,000 and taking it out of the pocket of Paul and putting it in the pocket of Peter.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to discuss that phase of the matter presently, when we reach it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state the only reason for that. Suppose this Government, if we pass this bill, appropriates $100,000,000 and it is distinctly understood that England, France, and Italy will make an appropriation of $200,000,000 more, so that the fund will be $300,000,000; then whatever products are purchased will be purchased out of that fund as a whole, whether it is purchased of England, of France, or of the United States. That is the only reason I can see for making an appropriation of money rather than a direct appropriation of the products themselves.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, all this is getting away from the proposition that I do not want forgotten and the proposition which I have stated.

Mr. President, I would not be so absolutely certain of this proposition—although the evidence was in my possession when I spoke the other day, but it was in my possession in such a way that I was under obligation not to use it, and the only reason I feel justified in using it to-day is because Mr. Taliaferro let the cat out of the sack—if the evidence were not in existence; but it can be had, and, in my judgment, before the committee gets through it will be beyond peradventure. I do not propose, sir, to cast my vote even when there is a well-founded doubt.

If there is a way to administer this fund beyond question, so that it will be administered straight and clean and to the best interests of the taxpayers of the United States, why, in the name of justice, should men under their oath take a chance in administering a trust fund? Would you do it with your business affairs? If you were standing here as a guardian of a trust fund, would you for a moment undertake to have it administered with such facts as these staring you in the face by such a machinery as that? And you should be 10 times more careful with a trust fund which may cause trouble in this country before we are through.

Passing a hundred million dollar appropriation upon a telegram! There is no more determination in the mind of Mr. Hoover since he visited the depopulated and crushed people of Europe to feed them than there was when he left here. He is not any more convinced now than he was when he took boat from New York that it would be necessary to do so.

Why did not we wait until the cry from Macedonia came to us? Where are the people of Europe who have petitioned the people of the United States for charity? Where is the supplication? It did not originate in Europe; it originated in Chicago. That is just as true as men tell the truth under oath, as these men have, and there was plenty of evidence in Chicago before Mr. Hoover left, that this was to be the program; yet, sir, you will take it from the people in this country who have reached the limit of their endurance.

I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, for the United States to bend a little further, to take on a little more of a burden, and to assume some further responsibility in order to do justice to those people who have felt the oppression of bureaucracy and kingship for three centuries. I have no sympathy in my heart for any of that remnant of kings and bureaucrats who are fast passing into oblivion and into other places, but I want the people or the taxpayers of the United States to be protected when we take this proposed action. I want men to administer this fund who have a due regard for the people of this country. My desire is to have it administered in such a way that it will serve both those who are to be fed and those who must pay for the feeding.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I was amazed to read in the Washington Post of this morning that we are about to furnish a large quantity of food to Germany and to receive in exchange therefor a certain quantity of Germany's shipping. I read from the article, which attracted my attention this morning and caused my amazement, as follows:

> The armistice conference at Treves between the German and allied shipping and food commissions, which include Sir John Beale Anderson and John A. Salter for Great Britain, and Edward N. Hurley, Lewis H. Sheldon, and Howard Heinz for the United States arranged for the delivery to the starving people of Germany from America 70,000 tons of pork and 200,000 tons of cereals. The Germans can negotiate for transformation of a portion of cereal ration into condensed milk for children. We get about 350,000 tons of shipping, half of the available German passenger ships, with capacity for 70,000 home-bound soldiers.
> The British get the other half of the passenger tonnage, smaller passenger ships, needed to move the Australians through the Suez Canal, which the Bismarck and Imperator could not pass. The remuneration to Germany at the current market rate for the used passenger ships will be its credit against the food they get from us. Two million tons of German cargo ships to be used for food shipments will be divided among the allies. All enemy ships are taken "without prejudice as to their final disposition," in which diplomatic phrase the German's find small comfort.
> The German ships are to be delivered at designated ports of Great Britain and France. The German sailors who bring them are to be sent back home at the allies' expense. German entreaties for further use of their sailors were denied by our negotiators, among other reasons being that we are not willing to take the risk of sending German-manned boats into American ports.

This is most astounding to me. I am emphatically opposed to such an arrangement. It does not have my approval. I do not believe there is any starvation in Germany. I believe the people of Germany are far better off than are the people of France and of Belgium. They have not felt the war nearly so much or so cruelly as have the people of France or of Belgium. Immediately after the conclusion of the armistice a great cry and clamor went up from Germany to have foodstuffs sent to her alleged starving people. Immediately that the armistice agreement was completed the first thing which we heard was a great cry and clamor from Germany for us to feed the alleged starving people of Germany. They even had the German women undertaking to get into communication with the women of this country in order that the German cry for food might be heard and heeded here. The matter was investigated by careful investigators, and it was found that there was no starvation in Germany; that starvation was not imminent nor was it threatening. It was found that the German people were not in need of food; that they had just harvested their 1918 crop, and had that crop in their cellars and storehouses. It was ascertained that they had sufficient food to carry them through the winter, at least; that there was no suffering because of lack of food. The false cry being exposed, for the time being the clamor of Germany for food quieted, but now it is renewed.

I do not doubt that every man, woman, and child in Germany would go to work and fill their cellars, storehouses, and bins with food, would store away enough food to last a year, and then would make affidavits that they had no food, that they were starving, if they thought that by so doing they could get something for nothing from the United States and could thereby starve to death a few more women and children in France and Belgium, where there is real and great suffering for the necessities of life. That is just about how much credence I put in the cry for food from Germany. I believe nothing that comes from Germany. I believe in nothing in Germany.

We should not furnish the Germans with food in return for ships. We should, as a conquering Nation, take those ships from Germany as a conquered nation. The trouble is that Germany does not feel that she is conquered; she does not feel that she is beaten. The people of Germany feel that they have never surrendered; that they are an unconquered, an unbeaten people. That feeling is paramount in their breasts to-day. I think we made a great mistake in not prosecuting the war until there was an unconditional surrender of Germany on German soil, until there was a smashing military victory over the Germans on German soil. Germany should not only have been beaten to the ground but she should have been beaten into the ground. Germany should have been subjected to a devastating invasion of fire and sword and been made to feel some of the terrible suffering she imposed upon innocent people. The guilty people of Germany should have been made to feel some of the hardships that they imposed upon the innocent.

Germany is not entitled to any consideration from us. Germany violated every principle of international law, of civilized warfare, of humanity and decency, and put herself beyond the pale of consideration. Not only were the German war dogs guilty of such conduct, but the people of Germany backed it up with their hearts, their pocketbooks, and their efforts. I believe that every time a woman or young girl was ravished by a brute of a German soldier in France or Belgium it caused a thrill of joy in the heart of every person in Germany to whom it became known. I believe that every time a little boy had his hands cut off at the wrists, every time a baby was impaled on a bayonet, every time a baby was grabbed out of its mother's arms and had its brains dashed out on the floor by a brutal German soldier, it caused a thrill of joy in the heart of every person in Germany who heard about it. If 1,000,000 German people heard about it, I believe there were 1,000,000 thrills of joy over it; if 10,000,000 people heard about it, I believe there were 10,000,000 thrills of joy over it; if 70,000,000 people—the population of Germany, I believe—had heard about it, I believe it would have caused 70,000,000 thrills of joy in German hearts.

I believe we are starting out to be entirely too soft in our treatment of the people who plunged this world into the most horrible war and devastating outrage upon humanity that has ever been known. The people who waged a wicked, infamous, criminal, and fiendish warfare upon the civilization of the world should be punished for it; they should be punished adequately; they should be punished severely. There is merit and justice in adequate and severe punishment under such circumstances. Yet I find from this morning's Washington Post that the people of Germany are renewing their oft-repeated whimpering and whining about the terms that are apparently in store for them. I read that Prince Lichnowsky, former German ambassador to Great Britain, yesterday gave the following statement to the Associated Press:

> A peace of right and justice, provided it is not merely to be a phrase behind which a peace of violence conceals itself as a pax Britannica, can only be such a peace as neither enslaves nor mutilates the conquered and which leaves him the possibility of recuperating, of paying his debts, and of entering with complete confidence into the peaceful competition of a society of nations. A league of nations which has its roots only in statutes and is not in the hearts of peoples is worthless.

Further down in his statement he says:

Hence a peace of justice would be only such a one as neither boycotts us nor lays upon us intolerable financial burdens which would make us dependents for all time, nor one which creates untenable borders and robs us of lands which we require geographically and economically.

It is the constant cry and refrain of the Germans that we must not be hard on Germany; that our terms to Germany should not be severe; that we must not humiliate Germany; that we should permit Germany quickly to recuperate her power and resuscitate her resources and take her place among the nations of the earth. That is the talk of a nation that assumes to speak to the other nations of the earth as an equal, on an equal footing, and not as a conquered nation, beneath the notice and almost beneath the contempt of the decent peoples of the world; not as a nation that has violated every precept of humanity and decency and which is entitled to no consideration except such as its conquerors see fit to give to it. I believe that cry will be kept up time after time, in season and out of season, until Germany will manage to obtain terms which she does not deserve and should not receive. That is evidently now the game of Germany. It is her deliberate plan, by trickery, deception, falsehood, appeals to pity, to obtain that which she could not win by war. I fear she may partially succeed.

If we vote the $100,000,000 proposed to be appropriated in the bill now before this body for consideration, I believe it will only be a short time until we will be called upon to vote $100,000,000, or more than that, to the alleged starving people of Germany, when there will be no necessity for it, when there will be no starvation in Germany, and when her alleged starvation will be merely a sham and pretense, a wicked deceit and falsehood, mere camouflage.

I am opposed to anything which approaches it or may lead to it. I believe that the people of Germany and the people who helped her to perpetrate a monstrous outrage on the world should be made to feel the hard heel of justice, and justice of the right kind. I am opposed to taking any step which may lead up to dealing softly or in an unjust manner with Germany. I say "unjust," because if she is given easy terms it will be unjust to all the rest of the world, at least to all countries and peoples not in league with her deviltry.

It seems to me that the United States is about to assume the rôle of being the big rich uncle to all the remainder of the world; that we are going to be a big rich uncle to all of Europe, friend and foe alike; and that if anybody needs help over there or gets into trouble, they will turn to Uncle Sam, their big rich uncle, for assistance. If we make the proposed appropriation which is before us for consideration, I believe it will encourage the unstable, restless, dissatisfied peoples of the remainder of the world to engage in revolution, in uprisings, in civil strife, in internecine warfare; to burn and destroy; to leave their vocations and destroy each other's crops and products; to neglect the cultivation of the soil; and to spend their time in Bolshevism and revolution and contentions among one another. Then, when they run out of food, I fear they will say, "Oh, we do not need to bother about that; Uncle Sam, our big rich uncle, the big rich uncle of all the world, will see that we get food; Uncle Sam will feed us; let Uncle Sam do it."

I am opposed to encouraging any such feeling or setting any such example or creating any such precedent. I am opposed to doing anything or taking any step that will be likely to create any such sentiment or hope in the hearts of the other peoples of the world. If we are going to feed the people of Europe this year, to keep them from becoming Bolsheviki, we will have to do it next year; for just so long as you let people know that you will feed them in order to make them abstain from assaults upon the civilization of the world, they will take you at your word and make you feed them. If we embark upon this policy, I think it will be only a few weeks until we will have to repeat it; and, if we continue it through this year, we will have to repeat it next year and the year after; and just so long as we are willing to feed people, to keep them in idleness, to keep them from becoming anarchists and making assaults upon the civilization of the world, we will have to keep it up; there will be no end to it. This will be merely the beginning and a very bad beginning, in my opinion. I believe the principle is wrong; I believe the policy is dangerous. I think it mistaken generosity. It may do credit to the heart, but I think it fraught with danger. In my opinion it is more good hearted than sound, safe, or just.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Martin, Ky.	Sherman
